In my judgment, if I am free to decide, as it appears to me on the authorities I am, that the deed of variation could operate to increase the rent and yet leave the original leases subsisting, I must hold, as I do, that that is what it did. I can see no intention here to create a new tenancy, rather the reverse.

F That, however, is not the end of the matter, for on that view, whilst it follows in my judgment that the deed of variation is not a lease or tack, it follows equally that it is prima facie chargeable under the heading, "Bond, covenant", etc. Counsel for the appellant, as I have observed, said that it is protected from the effect of that heading by the exception therein contained in these words, "nor rent reversed by a lease or tack". In my judgment, however, that is wrong, because the Stamp Act, 1891, is concerned not with transactions but with documents, and counsel is seeking in this exception to look not at the deed which creates the periodical sum of money but at the transaction which results from varying the original leases. It would, I think, be strange to give the expression "lease or tack" in this heading a different meaning from that in the heading "Lease or tack", and to look in the one case to the result of the joint effect of the instruments and in the other to the deed of variation alone.

H I find strong support for my view in what was said by BENNETT, J., in Duke of Westminster v. Store Properties, Ltd. (10). True he there applied Donellan v. Read (11) and held that the sum in question was not rent but a collateral payment, but he made pertinent observations as to the meaning of the expression "rent reserved" in the War Damage Act, 1943, which in my view apply even more forcefully to the expression "rent reserved by a lease or tack" in the "Bond, covenant", etc., heading of the Stamp Act, 1891. His Lordship said: (10)

"It is clear, I think, that the annual sum payable under the licence is not rent in the technical meaning of that term. A money rent is a sum reserved by a lessor on the occasion of a demise of land . . ."

(9) (1887), 20 L.R.Ir. at p. 484.

(11) [1824-34] All E.R. Rep. 639; (1832), 3 B. & Ad. 899.

Again (12):

"A sum payable to a landlord by a tenant by virtue of a collateral agreement containing no demise cannot, I think, properly be referred to as a rent reserved."

Then s. 77 (5) fits into place as a relieving provision limiting the higher duty which would be payable as a bond or covenant to the lesser amount attributable to a lease or tack for the amount of the increase in rent. So applied, it is in my judgment legitimate and correct, even in a taxing Act, so to read the subsection. It would be altogether fanciful to treat it as giving complete exoneration because the instrument is not a lease or tack. In that context, in my view, the subsection must mean that the instrument shall be chargeable as if it were a lease or tack. For these reasons, in my judgment the adjudication was correct and the appeal fails, and I am fortified that in conclusion by the difference in language between sub-s. (5) and all the other subsections of s. 77, which speak of a lease or agreement for a lease.

That is sufficient to dispose of the case, but I should add perhaps that, if I am wrong in the view which I have taken of the expression "rent reserved by a lease or tack", it can only be because it is right there not to consider the deed of variation alone but in relation to its effect on the original leases; but if so, then it seems to me that one must do the same in construing s. 77 (5). On this view of the matter, although the deed of variation does not destroy the old leases and create new ones, it is a lease or tack within the meaning of s. 77 (5) because it creates for the first time a lease at the new rent, a lease which is not covered by the ad valorem duty paid on the original, unaltered lease.

Counsel for the Crown did mount a further argument, that s. 77 (5) might be construed directly as saying that every instrument whereby the rent reserved by any other instrument chargeable with duty and duly stamped as a lease or tack (which are the opening words of the section) as is increased is liable to duty a lease or tack whether it be such or no, independently of any question of limiting liability otherwise payable under the "Bond, covenant" heading; and he craved in aid to some extent the marginal note to s. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876, in which the present s. 77 (5) first appeared. I would find it difficult so to construe a taxing Act, and I do not think I ought to have regard to that marginal note having regard to what is said in MAXWELL ON INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES, (11th Edn.) p. 42, and by SLADE, J., in Lougdon-Griffiths v. Smith, (13), and DONOVAN, J., in R. v. Bates (14). But having regard to my conclusions on the other points, I need not pursue this further. For these reasons, in my judgment the appeal fails.

C An “agreement for sale of output” between the taxpayer company “and/or their nominees” and a New Zealand company was to run for eight years from Oct. 1, 1952, the taxpayer company, however, having the “right of cancellation at any time after four years on giving six months’ notice”.
That agreement was cancelled as from Sept. 30, 1955, by a second agreement dated Mar. 16, 1955, in almost identical terms, which was to run for ten years from Oct. 1, 1955, with a similar right of cancellation after five D years. Under the agreements the taxpayer company agreed to take over all the New Zealand company purchases of stock, i.e., meat, wool and pelts at the actual cost price, and the New Zealand company agreed to carry out all necessary processing (slaughtering, freezing, felling, curing, placing f.o.b., etc.) at a charge which, after payment of operating expenses, etc., would leave it an annual profit of £15,000. A resolution of the directors of the E taxpayer company on Aug. 23, 1955, “put on record that the nominees mentioned in the [first] contract . . . are the purchasers”, the K. company.
The taxpayer company accounted to the K. company for all the profits of the trading under the agreements, receiving only a commission for its work.
But the taxpayer company itself paid the freight from New Zealand and arranged and paid the marine insurance, held the bills of lading and delivered
F them to the purchasers (sales on c.i.f. terms), paid the New Zealand company the cost price and arranged with its own bank for letters of credit in New Zealand, invoiced the customers and collected the money, and finally held the money for the K. company on a general account to be drawn on as the K. company wished. Ninety-five per cent. of the taxpayer company’s
G turnover was for business with the K. company, covering the whole of the English end of that company’s business. On the other hand the taxpayer company acted for other principals, twenty in 1958-59 and 1959-60 and over fifty in 1960-61, though all doing business with the New Zealand company. The taxpayer company was assessed to tax for the years 1955-56 to 1959-60 on the basis that the profits under the agreements arose from trading by the taxpayer company as principal, and alternatively, in all
H years except the first, was assessed on the basis that the profits arose from its acting as agent for the K. company, which was a company incorporated and resident in South Africa. The assessments on the taxpayer company as agent for the K. company showed the description of income assessable generally as “meat salesmen” but in one case as “agents”. The General
I Commissioners of Income Tax found that the profits arose from trading by the taxpayer company not as principal but as agent for the K. company, and that the K. company was exempted from liability (under s. 370 of the Income Tax Act, 1952) as a non-resident company chargeable in the name of a broker (including a general commission agent) by the proviso to s. 373 (1)* of the Income Tax Act, 1952. On appeal from the discharge of both assessments,

Held: (i) the decision of the commissioners discharging the assessments

on the taxpayer company as principal would be upheld (see p. 982, letter D, post) because the facts found by the commissioners provided ample support for their conclusion that the taxpayer company acted as agent for the K. company and not as principal (see p. 981, letter F, post); further, the court would not, in the exercise of its discretion, remit the case to the commissioners for further evidence and findings, the Crown having already had opportunity to elicit the relevant points (see p. 982, letters B and C, post).

(ii) s. 373 (1), and the proviso thereto, of the Act of 1952 did not relieve the K. company from being assessed to tax in the name of the taxpayer company as its agent under s. 370, because the taxpayer company was not a "general commission agent" (which term was included in the definition of "broker" for the purposes of s. 373 (1)) for the reasons indicated in (iii) below; and accordingly the commissioners' decision to discharge the agency assessments would be reversed (see p. 986, letters C and F, post).

(iii) to be a general commission agent for the purposes of s. 373 (1) an agent (a) must have sufficient broker-like qualities to make it reasonable for Parliament to have provided that the term "broker" should include him, (b) should be employed by the non-resident in the ordinary way, even if regularly, and (c) must hold himself out as being ready to work for clients generally and not confine his activities to one principal or an insignificant number of principals (see p. 985, letter I, to p. 986, letter A, and p. 986, letter B, post); but the taxpayer company did many acts not characteristic of brokers, was lacking in generality of custom, and was little more than the English end of K. company's business and so, as stated in (ii) above did not qualify as a general commission agent for the purposes of s. 373 (1) (see p. 986, letter D, post).

(iv) in an assessment on the taxpayer company as "agents for" the K. company, the description of the income assessable as "agents" was not so gross and misleading an error as to be incapable of cure by s. 514* of the Income Tax Act, 1952, accordingly the assessment was valid (see p. 987, letter D, post).

Per CURIAM: in preparing cases stated it is to be remembered that over-lengthy paragraphs are inconvenient, and that a system of numbering or lettering each paragraph and sub-paragraph is warmly to be commended (see p. 981, letter D, post).

Appeal allowed on (ii) above.

Case Stated.

The taxpayer company appealed to the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax for the City of London against the following assessments to income tax made on it under Case I of Sch. D to the Income Tax Act, 1952, 1955-56 (one assessment) person assessed London Produce Co., Ltd. (the taxpayer company), description of income assessable meat salesmen, £80,000 (additional); in each of the successive years 1956-57 to 1959-60 inclusive two assessments, * Section 514, so far as material, is set out at p. 986, letters H and I, post.

A one on London Produce Co., Ltd., simply, description of income assessable meat salesmen and the other alternative assessment on London Produce Co., Ltd., as agent for Kaiapoi Trading Co. (Proprietary), Ltd., the description of income assessable being meat salesmen in each case except in 1956-57 when it was agents. The amounts of tax assessed were (the same for both assessments in each year): 1956-57 £80,000 (additional—as agents not additional); 1957-58 £120,000 (additional—as agents not additional); 1958-59 £85,000 (additional—as agents not additional); 1959-60 £85,000. It also appealed against assessments to the profits tax in which similar issues were involved. Kaiapoi Trading Co. (Proprietary), Ltd., was for the purpose of the proceedings admitted to be incorporated and resident in the Union of South Africa.

C A preliminary question for determination was whether the profits in question arose from the sale of meat by the taxpayer company trading on its own account, as contended by the Crown, or only from its acting as agent for the Kaiapoi company as contended by the taxpayer company. In the event of the commissioners accepting the contention of the taxpayer company, two further questions arose (i) whether having regard to the provisions of s. 370 and s. 373 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1952, the taxpayer company was assessable as agent for the Kaiapoi company as the Crown contended, or was not so assessable by reason of the proviso to s. 373 (1), and (ii) whether the Kaiapoi company was exempt from United Kingdom taxation under the terms of the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (South Africa) Order, 1947*. The taxpayer company contended before the commissioners as follows:

E “(i) That on the evidence the assessments made on the [taxpayer] company as meat salesmen in its own right were incorrect. (ii) That as regards the alternative assessment as ‘agent for Kaiapoi’, (a) the business for [the Kaiapoi company] as meat salesmen is carried on in the U.K. through [the taxpayer company], being a bona fide broker or general commission agent acting in the ordinary course of its business as such, and is not therefore within the term ‘permanent establishment’ in art. 11 (1) (j) of the Schedule to the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (South Africa) Order, 1947; with the result that the trade of [the Kaiapoi company] is exempt from taxation in the U.K. (b) Alternatively, that [the Kaiapoi company] is not liable to assessment under s. 370, Income Tax Act, 1952, by reason of the proviso to s. 373 (1) of the said Act in that the evidence shows that [the taxpayer company] was at all material times a person carrying on bona fide the business of a broker in the United Kingdom (which expression includes a general commission agent) and received in respect of the business of Kaiapoi which was transacted through it remuneration at a rate not less than that customary in the class of business in question. (c) Alternatively as regards the assessment made upon [the taxpayer company] for 1956-57 ‘as agents for Kaiapoi’ in respect of the profits of [the Kaiapoi company, the Kaiapoi company] had never carried on such a trade and the assessment was accordingly bad in law and should be discharged.”

H The Crown contended before the commissioners: (i) That the assessments made upon the taxpayer company as “meat salesmen” on its own account were correct in principle because: (a) under the provisions of the agreements of 1953 and 1955 the taxpayer company was the principal and not an agent in the transactions with the North Canterbury Sheepfarmers’ Co-operative Freezing, Export and Agency Co., Ltd., a New Zealand company. (b) The taxpayer company sold the products despatched to London by the New Zealand company in the London meat markets on its own behalf. (c) No genuine transactions were carried out by the taxpayer company on behalf of the Kaiapoi company but the moneys remitted to the Kaiapoi company were merely remittances by the taxpayer company of its own funds. (d) The Kaiapoi company took no part in the transactions in question and was a mere recipient of those funds. (ii) Alternatively, the assessments made on the taxpayer company as agents for Kaiapoi were correct in principle in that neither the proviso to s. 373 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1952, nor the similar provisions contained in art. 11 (1) (j) of the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Incomes) (South Africa) Order, 1947, applied because:—(a) there was no evidence to support the contention of the taxpayer company that it was carrying on bona fide the business of broker or general commission agent in the United Kingdom within the meaning of those provisions; (b) even if it was held that the taxpayer company was carrying on bona fide the business of a broker or general commission agent within the meaning of the said provisions, the transactions in question were not carried out in the ordinary course of its business as such; (c) the rate of remuneration received by the taxpayer company in respect of the sales transacted on behalf of the Kaiapoi company was less than that customary in that class of business; (d) the specimen shipping and commercial documents were neutral as to the question whether the taxpayer company was bona fide carrying on the business of a broker or general commission agent or whether it was solely the authorised agent carrying on the regular agency of the Kaiapoi company; (e) the advertising extracts did not support the taxpayer company's contention that it was acting as a broker or general commission agent; (f) the "various sales" referred to in the evidence were insignificant in relation to the trade of the taxpayer company as a whole and were irrelevant to the issue of whether the taxpayer company was carrying on bona fide the business of a broker or general commission agent. (iii) That the assessment for the year 1956-57 was valid despite the erroneous description of the profits, and such an error did not render the assessment void, having regard to the provisions of s. 514 of the Income Tax Act, 1952.

The commissioners found on the evidence before them that the proceeds from the sales of the goods in question were received by the appellant (London Produce Co., Ltd.) the taxpayer company, a company registered in the United Kingdom, on behalf of the Kaiapoi Trading Co. (Proprietary) Ltd., (a company incorporated in the Union of South Africa and not resident in the United Kingdom) and that the profits derived therefrom were not profits of the trade carried on by the taxpayer company. They also found from the evidence that the goods were sold on the London meat market through the taxpayer company as authorised agent for the Kaiapoi company. They held that the taxpayer company was at all material times carrying on the regular agency of the Kaiapoi company within sub-s. (1) (a) of s. 373 of the Income Tax Act, 1952.

On the contention on behalf of the taxpayer company that the Kaiapoi company was not chargeable to income tax in the name of the taxpayer company in respect of such profits of the Kaiapoi company by reason of the proviso to the said s. 373 (1), they found on the evidence and with regard to the words of the proviso, that the taxpayer company as agent carried out the sales in question on behalf of the Kaiapoi company in the ordinary course of its business as such, and that the taxpayer company was a person carrying on bona fide the business of a broker or general commission agent in the United Kingdom within para. (i) of the proviso. They also found that in the relevant period the taxpayer company received in respect of the business of the Kaiapoi company transacted through it remuneration by way of commission at the rate of 1-1¼ per cent. which on the evidence was at a rate not less than that customary in the London meat market and that, therefore, proviso (ii) of s. 373 was also satisfied.

They also considered the arguments on behalf of the parties regarding the Double Taxation Relief (South Africa) Order, 1947. They accepted that in the relevant periods the Kaiapoi company was a "Union enterprise" within art. 11 (1) (h) and held on the facts that the business dealings of the Kaiapoi company

A were carried on in the United Kingdom through the taxpayer company, a bona fide broker or general commission agent acting in the ordinary course of its business as such, and that the Kaiapoi company had not within art. 11 (1) (j) a permanent establishment in the United Kingdom so as to make the profits in question liable to United Kingdom taxes under art. 111 (2) thereof. Accordingly, they held that the Kaiapoi company was not chargeable in the name
B of the taxpayer company in respect of the profits or gains arising from the sales in question. They did not accept the contention made on behalf of the taxpayer company that the assessment for 1956-57 made on the taxpayer company as agents for Kaiapoi Trading Co. (Proprietary), Ltd., in which the profits of trade assessed were entered as "agents" was bad in law. The commissioners' decision, which was applicable also to the profits tax assessments, was given in
C principle at the request of the parties, leaving the assessments to be dealt with in accordance therewith in due course. In due course it was reported to the commissioners that figures had been agreed between the parties on the basis of their decision in principle, and on Nov. 14, 1966, they determined the appeals by discharging all the income tax assessment.

The Crown appealed by way of Case State to the High Court.

MEGARRY, J.: This is a Case Stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax for the City of London. It relates to appeals against a series of assessments for the years 1955-56 to 1959-60 on the taxpayer company, E London Produce Co., Ltd. Some of these assessments were made on the taxpayer company as principals; others, in the alternative, were made on the taxpayer company as agents for a South African company called Kaiapoi Trading Co. (Proprietary), Ltd., which I shall call the Kaiapoi company. One other company is concerned, viz., a New Zealand company entitled North Canterbury Sheep-farmers' Co-operative Freezing, Export and Agency Co., Ltd., which I shall call
F the New Zealand company. In the barest of outlines, the case concerns the tax consequences of quantities of New Zealand lamb sent by the New Zealand company to the United Kingdom and sold by the taxpayer company, with a subsequent accounting by the taxpayer company to the Kaiapoi company. The income assessable has in all cases save one been put under the description of "meat salesmen". The exception is an assessment for 1956-57 on the taxpayer
G company as agents for the Kaiapoi company, where the description was "agents".

The commissioners held, first, that the taxpayer company had received the proceeds of sale as agents for the Kaiapoi company, and that the profits derived therefrom were not profits of a trade carried on by the taxpayer company. They accordingly discharged all the assessments on the taxpayer company as principal. Secondly, they held that the sales made by the taxpayer company as the Kaiapoi
H company's agent fell within the proviso to s. 373 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1952, so that the Kaiapoi company was not chargeable in the name of the taxpayer company in respect of any of the agency assessments. The commissioners accordingly discharged all these assessments as well. The question of law is stated as being whether there was evidence on which the commissioners could properly arrive at their decision, and whether on the facts found by them their
I decision was correct in law.

There is a further Case Stated in relation to the profits tax, but this has not been separately argued, and it is common ground that the result in that case will follow the result in the income tax case. Questions of double taxation relief also arise, but again it has been agreed that a decision on the main issue will dispose of these questions as well. Accordingly, I say no more about them.

The facts are fully set out in the Case Stated, and I propose to refer to them in this judgment only so far as is necessary to resolve the issues before me. I take the first point first, viz., the assessments on the taxpayer company as principals. In the forefront of the argument by counsel for the Crown were two agreements between the New Zealand company and the taxpayer company. The Kaiapoi company, who, counsel for the taxpayer company contends, were the principals, were not named as parties to these agreements. The essential question is whether the taxpayer company were principals, as counsel for the Crown contends, or merely agents for the Kaiapoi company, as counsel for the taxpayer company says. I will read the first agreement. It is undated, but may have been made on either Feb. 20, 1953, or Mar. 18, 1953. It is headed, "Agreement for sale of output", and it runs as follows:

"1. The parties are the [taxpayer company] and/or their nominees and the [New Zealand company]. 2. The term of the agreement is to be for eight (8) years commencing on Oct. 1, 1952, the [taxpayer company] having the right of cancellation at any time after four years on giving six months' notice. 3. The [taxpayer company] agrees to take over all the [New Zealand company] purchase of stock—i.e., meat, wool and pelts—at the actual cost prices. The [New Zealand company] will carry out all necessary processing at such a charge for slaughtering freezing together with felling and curing charges and placing F.O.B. as with any other operations by the [New Zealand company] will after payment of all such operating expenses and costs of repairs and renewals and depreciation on works and plant up to the limit permitted as a deduction by the Land and Income Tax Acts of New Zealand or the Commissioner of Inland Revenue's usual practice for the time being in force or ruling leave the [New Zealand company] an annual profit of £15,000."

The second agreement, which condescends to date itself Mar. 16, 1955, is almost identical; but the term of the agreement is expressed to be ten years commencing on Oct. 1, 1955, the right of cancellation is after five years, and a sentence at the end runs: "This contract cancels as from Sept. 30, 1955, the previous contract dated Mar. 18, 1953."

During the argument these agreements have been described as being "businessmen's agreements"; and I do not think this too harsh a term. Each, indeed, is in one sense a businessman's dream, namely, an agreement written on a single sheet of paper. But not for the first time, nor the last, has the businessman's dream become the lawyer's nightmare. Unidentified nominees who did not sign the agreement are expressed to be contracting parties either in addition to or in substitution for the taxpayer company. There is nothing to indicate by whom the agreement is determinable (or when), whether this constitution of the parties is to be cumulative or alternative, and, if the latter, which of the alternates is to be the party at any given time. It was suggested that the idea was that the taxpayer company should be able to nominate some other person to replace themselves as principals, and that the Kaiapoi company were in fact nominated. In support of this, I was referred to a certified copy of a resolution of the directors of the taxpayer company made on Aug. 23, 1955. This reads as follows:

"It was also resolved to put on record that the nominees, mentioned in the contract with [the New Zealand company] dated Feb. 20, 1953, for the sale of the output for eight years, are the purchasers Kaiapoi Trading Co. (Pty.), Ltd."

This document heightens the obscurity. What in effect is being said by the directors of the taxpayer company is this: "Last March we made our 1955 ten years 'agreement for sale of output' which in just over five weeks will supplant our 1953 eight years 'agreement for sale of output'. Therefore, we now record that the nominees under our moribund 1953 eight years agreement are [the Kaiapoi company], but we carefully abstain from saying anything about the nominees under the 1955 agreement which will soon begin to run for ten years from Oct. 1 next." It is not, I suppose, beyond possibility that

A there was some sound business reason for doing this; but, if so, that reason is remarkably well concealed.

If under the agreement of 1953 the Kaiapoi company was duly nominated and substituted for the taxpayer company, the operation of the agreement has further curiosities. By cl. 2, it is the taxpayer company, not the Kaiapoi company, which by name is given the right of cancellation. Further, by cl. 3, which has a certain tortuous obscurity of grammar about it, it is "the purchasing company", B a term which cl. 1 seems to apply to the taxpayer company and not the nominees, which agrees to take over all the New Zealand company's purchases of stock. I can well understand the puzzlement which para. 6 (f) of the Case Stated seems to suggest that the commissioners felt about these agreements and the appointment of the Kaiapoi company as nominees; nor does it surprise me to find C that the effect of these documents is not there stated with complete accuracy. In order to avoid possible confusion, I should at this stage interpose that the paragraph numbered 6 in the Case Stated in fact consists of fourteen paragraphs spread over more than three pages of brief-size paper, and for ease of reference during the argument I caused these fourteen paragraphs to be lettered from (a) to (n). My reference to para. 6 (f) is thus to the resultant sub-paragraph. The D paragraph numbered 9 is more modest, for it contains only seven paragraphs, and these have been lettered from (a) to (g). I would add the general comment that it would be welcome if, in preparing Cases Stated, commissioners would remember that over-lengthy paragraphs are inconvenient, and that a system of numbering or lettering each paragraph and sub-paragraph is warmly to be commended.

E I am wholly unconvinced by the contention that these lame and inept agreements established and maintained the taxpayer company as principals throughout the years of assessment in question. Agreements, when intelligible, may indeed confer legal rights; but whatever may be the legal rights, one must not avert one's gaze from what in fact was done. The facts found by the commissioners seem to me to provide ample support for their conclusion that the taxpayer F company acted as agent for the Kaiapoi company and not as principal. In particular, the taxpayer company merely received a commission for its work, and it accounted to the Kaiapoi company for all the profits of the trading. I can see no justification for interfering with the conclusion of the commissioners, even if I thought it wrong; and I do not.

G I may add that I am extremely doubtful what legal effect, if any, the agreements had. Many business transactions are based on agreements which would not hold water as legally enforceable contracts. As I said in a recent case on very different facts, Tillyard v. Page (1):

H "Much business is transacted on a well-founded faith that whatever legal imperfections there may be each party will in good faith carry out the spirit of the transaction: and in the great majority of cases such transactions are carried to a satisfactory conclusion, despite the inability of the parties on either side to enforce them in a court of law. Where by reason of death, insolvency or otherwise the transaction is halted in mid-course it may become necessary to analyse the legal consequences of what has been done, and it may then be found that the parties were bound to each other in honour and in business probity but not by law. Even these businessmen who fully realise I this may engage in this practice undeterred by what they regard as no more than a fair business risk."

In the present case the agreements may have sufficed to establish some business understanding, based on the general drift of the documents without paying undue attention to their language; but they cannot destroy the effect of what was done.

(1) (Mar. 15, 1968), unreported.

Counsel for the Crown asks me to send the case back to the commissioners under s. 64 (6) and (7), both for further findings on the evidence already given and for further evidence to be adduced. The burden of his complaint is that there is nothing to show whether the New Zealand company assented to the taxpayer company trading not as a principal but as agent for the Kaiapoi company, though (his brief summary does scant justice to the five questions which he formulated in writing. I do not think it right to remit the case under either subsection. The inspector of taxes has had his day before the commissioners, and can hardly complain if he omitted any attempt to elicit the points on which he now wants to have the case remitted; and it is not suggested that he made the attempt and failed. In any case, if in the United Kingdom the taxpayer company traded throughout as agent for the Kaiapoi company, behaving towards it as an agent behaves to his principal, I am not at all sure that the fact that the New Zealand company regarded the taxpayer company as its principal would, if established, alter the fact that the taxpayer company conducted the transactions here as agent for the Kaiapoi company. At all events, in the exercise of the discretion which in this respect I admittedly have, I do not send the case back. Accordingly, I uphold the decision of the commissioners discharging the assessments of the taxpayer company as principal.

I turn, then, to the second point, viz., that under s. 373 (1). The starting point is s. 370. This reads:

"A non-resident person shall be assessable and chargeable in respect of any profits or gains arising, whether directly or indirectly, through or from any factorship, agency, receivership, branch or management, and shall be so assessable and chargeable in the name of the factor, agent, receiver, branch or manager."

This catches a wide range of persons; and although (perhaps somewhat oddly, in view of s. 373) there is no express mention of "brokers", they are admittedly included in the term "agent".

From this sweeping embrace, s. 373 (1) proceeds to make two exceptions, one in the body of the subsection and the other in the proviso. The proviso, instead of performing a proviso's usual function of modifying or reducing the ambit of the substantive subsection and the exception that it makes, in fact adds an additional exception. The explanation seems to be that the proviso operates as a proviso not to the subsection as a whole but to certain words in the subsection reducing its scope, and prevents these words of reduction from operating in the case mentioned in the proviso. The subsection reads as follows:

"(1) Nothing in this Part of this Act shall render a non-resident person chargeable in the name of a broker or in the name of an agent not being—

(a) an authorised person carrying on the regular agency of the non-resident person; or

(b) a person chargeable under this Part of this Act as if he were an agent, in respect of profits or gains arising from sales or transactions carried out through such a broker or agent:

Provided that where sales or transactions are carried out on behalf of a non-resident person through a broker in the ordinary course of his business as such and the broker—

(i) is a person carrying on bona fide the business of a broker in the United Kingdom; and

(ii) receives in respect of the business of the non-resident person which is transacted through him remuneration at a rate not less than that customary in the class of business in question, then, notwithstanding that the broker is a person who acts regularly for the non-resident person as such broker, the non-resident person shall not be chargeable in the name of that broker in respect of profits or gains arising from those sales or transactions.

In this subsection, 'broker' includes a general commission agent."

- A The origin of the substantive part of this subsection is the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, s. 31 (6), which later became r. 10 of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918. What is now the proviso did not appear until it was introduced by the Finance Act, 1925, s. 17 (1). The general effect of the subsection proper seems to be that s. 370 is not to bite in the case of brokers (including general commission agents) and agents where they are not the non-resident's regular
- B agents but only act for him casually. Non-residents would therefore not be deterred by thoughts of tax liability under s. 370 from bringing their business to casual brokers (including general commission agents) and agents.

- One likely consequence of this provision seems to be that irregularity was encouraged and constancy penalised. An agent or broker might well find that, however ably he satisfied his non-resident clients, thoughts of tax liability would
- C sooner or later impel them to leave him for others. A dog-like fidelity to one agent might be costly; better the eclectic bee, flitting from flower to flower. This may at least be part of the reason for the enactment in 1952 of the predecessor to the proviso. This proviso is much narrower than the substantive subsection. It is confined to brokers (including general commission agents), and does not apply to other agents. It also lays down three prerequisites for its
- D application: (i) the sales or transactions must be carried out through a broker "in the ordinary course of his business as such"; (ii) the broker must be a person carrying on the business of a broker in the United Kingdom; and (iii) in respect of the non-resident's business transacted through him, the broker must receive remuneration at a rate not less than that customary in the class of business in question.

- E The issue before me turns on the proviso. Section 370 admittedly brings the taxpayer company within the net, and the question is whether the proviso lets the taxpayer company out of it. The commissioners held that it did, and counsel for the taxpayer company seeks to sustain that decision. Counsel for the Crown, on the other hand, says that it does not. It is now not questioned that the conditions of the proviso are satisfied, including the requirement that the remuneration should be at a rate not less than that customary in the class of business in question. The only real issue is whether the taxpayer company was a
- F "broker" within the proviso, remembering that the subsection states that " 'broker' includes a general commission agent ".

- There has been much discussion about the somewhat puzzling and undefined expression, "general commission agent". I am not the first judge to be troubled
- G by it. In Gavazzi v. Mace (2) ROWLATT, J., referred to the Finance (No. 2) Act 1915, s. 31 (6), and r. 10 of the All Schedules Rules in the Act of 1918 (the predecessors of the substantive part of s. 373 (1) of the Act of 1952) and to the phrase

- "a non-resident shall not be chargeable in the name of a broker or general commission agent, or in the name of an agent not being an authorised person",

- H as it then stood. He said (3):

- "I find great difficulty in quite understanding the fabric of this enactment. First of all, I do not quite see why you want the words 'broker or general commission agent' at all, because a broker or general commission agent is an agent who is not an authorised person carrying on a regular agency
- I of the non-resident person, and therefore they would be protected without being mentioned at all. But they are put in, I suppose, as a sort of indication of the line on which the draftsman's mind is travelling before he comes to the phrase which supersedes those words, and expresses a larger idea which includes them."

(2) (1926), 10 Tax Cas. 698 at p. 744.

(3) (1926), 10 Tax Cas. at p. 744.

On the facts of the case, he held that the United Kingdom agents were not brokers or general commission agents as they were really working for the non-resident firm: but that was before the Act of 1925 had introduced what is now the proviso. ROWLATT, J., referred (4) to the fact of the agents accepting a bill of exchange which enabled the sellers to get their money in advance, and said that this “differentiates them entirely, and must differentiate them, from the position of a general commission agent. It was contended, as I understand it, that because they were remunerated by a commission, and by the full commission which is earned in this trade, therefore there was no consideration for them being anything else, they were merely general commission agents. I do not think that is possible. I think they were doing something clearly outside the scope of general commission agents; and if, it is said that at Liverpool people, who are there called commission agents, do this work, I am afraid the only result of it is that I must hold that what is understood by ‘general commission agents’ by those people is not what the Act of Parliament means; because I think it means that a general commission agent is not a man, within the meaning of this Act of Parliament, who brings that sort of advantage to his principal.”

In Belfour v. Mace (5) ROWLATT, J., again referred to s. 31 (6), of the Act of 1915 in relation to a firm called Messrs. Bernasconi. He said (6):

“I think this agent is assessable—he is not in receipt of the profits or gains, but I do not think he is a general commission agent within the meaning of this sub-s. (6). He is doing Messrs. Bernasconi’s entire business in most of their goods; he only has six other employers, and he has precluded himself from acting for any other manufacturer in goods that compete with Messrs. Bernasconi; and he gets commission, as was pointed out to me (and really it is not immaterial) from Messrs. Bernasconi on orders which customers place with Messrs. Bernasconi by going to Cernobbio where they live and giving these orders there. He is not a general commission agent. He is Messrs. Bernasconi’s agent, I think, clearly within the meaning of this subsection and it seems to me that he is also an agent and an authorised person carrying on the non-resident’s regular agency. I do not quite know what that means, but so far as Messrs. Bernasconi want things done in this country, this gentleman does them all including the posting on of the acceptances of the orders. I do not want to say too much about those words, they seem to me rather obscure, but I think this gentleman is not excluded by this subsection from being assessed . . .”

This decision was affirmed on appeal (7), where, however, this point did not arise. This passage seems to indicate that in deciding whether a man is a general commission agent one factor that must be considered is how many principals he has or is willing to have. On this footing, “general” seems to be used in relation to the agent holding himself out to the public. On the other hand, counsel for the Crown forcefully urged that “general” is used in relation to markets. Brokers, he said, have recognised markets, such as wool brokers, tea brokers, rubber brokers and the like. In the end, however, he somewhat shifted his ground, without abandoning any territory, and contended that the term “general commission agent” was inserted to cover (a) those who would be brokers if there were a recognised market for the goods in which they deal, and (b) those who deal in a broker-like way with several commodities but because of the generality of their dealings are not usually described as brokers. Further or alternatively, he submitted that “general” was used as meaning that the agent must have a generality of customers and not merely act for only one principal.

A On the facts of the present case, counsel for the Crown accordingly said that the taxpayer company was not a general commission agent for two reasons. First, it did many acts uncharacteristic of brokers or general commission agents. He listed seven of these acts. (i) The taxpayer company paid the freight from New Zealand to the United Kingdom. (ii) The taxpayer company both arranged and paid for marine insurance; and neither of these activities, he pointed out, B was connected with the sale of the goods, but both were connected rather with their procurement. (iii) By inference, he said, at some stage it appeared that the taxpayer company held the bills of lading and so partook of the nature of factors rather than of brokers. (iv) Again by inference, he said, the taxpayer company delivered the bills of lading to the purchaser; and he pointed out that the sales were on c.i.f. terms. (v) The taxpayer company paid the New Zealand company the cost price of the goods and arranged with its bank for letters of credit in New Zealand. (vi) The taxpayer company apparently invoiced the customers itself, and also collected the money. (vii) After the transaction was completed the taxpayer company held the money for the Kaiapoi company on a general account, to be drawn on as the Kaiapoi company wished. Of these seven acts, he said, Nos. (iii), (iv) and (vi) were also to be found in T. L. Boyd & Son, Ltd. v. Stephen (8) which is reported with Guazzi v. Mace (8), to which D I have already referred. Secondly, counsel for the Crown pointed to the fact that ninety-five per cent. of the taxpayer company's turnover was for the Kaiapoi company; see para. 6 (d) of the Case and document 17. The taxpayer company was in fact, he said, little more than the Kaiapoi company's factotum: it did the whole of the English end of Kaiapoi's business, and was in no real sense of the word "general" in relation to its clientèle. E

Counsel for the taxpayer company, on the other hand, pointed out that in fact the taxpayer company acted for a substantial number of other principals, as documents 14 and 15 showed. For 1958-59 and for 1959-60 there were over twenty, and for 1960-61 over fifty. Even though the contribution of these other principals came to a mere five per cent. of the total turnover, neither their number F nor the number of the carcasses which they consigned to London was negligible. He also provided a general counter to the arguments of counsel for the Crown by saying that, where there is a commercial term such as "general commission agent" which is not a term of art, few tribunals could be better fitted to apply it than the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax for the City of London; and he urged that time had not stood still since ROWLATT, J., had G considered the term.

Helpful though counsel have been, I do not find myself in a position from which I can advance with any great alacrity to the task of defining or explaining the term "general commission agent". I feel little temptation in the process of defining each of the words separately and then adding the bits together; for such an operation is notoriously unreliable, as, indeed, the Holy Roman Empire and the Lord Privy Seal have long testified. But I do derive some assistance from the context in which the expression is used. First, s. 373 (1) provides that "In this subsection, 'broker' includes a general commission agent". Parliament may, of course, do anything; but in the absence of any indication to the contrary, I begin with the assumption that when a statute provides that "'A' includes 'B'", "B" has a meaning which is ejusdem generis with "A", or at least appears H to be suitable for inclusion as an expanded form of "A". Whatever the urge to brevity, I would not expect "black" to be defined as including "white", nor the "United Kingdom" as including "Europe". Accordingly, I consider that a "general commission agent" must have sufficient broker-like qualities to make it reasonable for Parliament to provide that "broker" should include him. After all, brokers are essentially negotiators for commission.

Second, the general trend of the proviso is to confer exemption on non-residents who merely employ brokers for broking in the ordinary way, even if they regularly employ the same one. The words "ordinary course of his business", "carrying on bona fide the business" and "a rate not less than that customary in the class of business in question" seem to me to be significant; in relation to broking the proviso is redolent of ordinariness. Third, the word "general" in the phrase "general commission agent" itself must have some import; and in the context I think that the most likely sense is that of a commission agent who holds himself out as being ready to work for clients generally, and who does not in substance confine his activities to one principal, or an insignificant number of principals. This, perhaps, is another facet of his broker-like qualities; he must be broker-like in his receipt of custom.

If that view is right, then in my judgment the only possible conclusion that the commissioners could reach on the primary facts found by them is that the taxpayer company was neither a broker nor a general commission agent. It did many acts not characteristic of brokers; and it was sadly lacking in generality of custom. Even the principals who contributed to the five per cent. of the taxpayer company's turnover did their business through the New Zealand company, who handled the carcasses in the same way as their own, and received the payments for them from the taxpayer company. I think that counsel for the Crown was right in his submission that the taxpayer company was little more than the English end of the Kaiapoi company's business, doing all that had to be done for that company, and far more than is truly broker-like. I do not think it is within either the letter or the spirit of the section that a non-resident should be able to escape taxation by virtue of the proviso if in substance what is done is that he carries on business within the United Kingdom through the medium of an agent who is virtually a sole agent, running the entire business for him and merely sending him remittances on request. In my judgment, such transactions fall outside an exemption intended for the protection of genuine transactions of a brokerage type. Accordingly, I reverse the decision of the commissioners so far as it relates to the agency assessments.

Finally, I must deal with a short point which counsel for the taxpayer company took with becoming diffidence. As I have mentioned, there is one assessment of £80,000 for 1956-57 in which the description of the income assessable is "agents", and the person assessed is described as the taxpayer company "as agents for" the Kaiapoi company. But, says counsel for the taxpayer company, the Kaiapoi company does not act as agent and has no income as such, and therefore that assessment must be bad. With a glance at counsel for the Crown, he then added that s. 514 (2) and (3) were not ample enough to preserve counsel for the Crown from this abyss. These subsections are as follows:

"(2) An assessment, charge, warrant or other proceeding which purports to be made in pursuance of this Act shall not be quashed, or deemed to be void or voidable, for want of form, or be affected by reason of a mistake, defect or omission therein, if the same is in substance and effect in conformity with or according to the intent and meaning of this Act, and if the person or property charged or intended to be charged or affected thereby is designated therein according to common intent and understanding.

"(3) An assessment or charge made upon an assessment shall not be impeached or affected (a) by reason of a mistake therein as to—(i) the name or surname of a person liable; or (ii) the description of any profits or property; or (iii) the amount of the tax charged; or (b) by reason of any variance between the notice and the certificate of charge or assessment."

Then there is a proviso which I need not read. However apt these provisions might be for minor deviations such as mis-spellings of names, slight inaccuracies in the descriptions of sources of income and the like, they could not, it is said, rescue assessments based on categorical departures in which names or sources of income were wholly misdescribed; and "agents" could by no feat of forensic dexterity

A be made to appear as merely a minor variation of "meat salesmen". That is the contention.

I shall not attempt an exegesis of the subsections. I would be slow to accept that they provide an impervious coverlet for gross errors. One may observe the form of para. (a) of sub-s. (3); what this saves from impeachment is a mistake in an assessment "as to" the name or surname of a person liable, and so on. This

B suggests that, for example, something recognisable as the true name of the person liable must appear in the assessment, and only if it does is any mistake as to that name cured by the subsection. Faulty spelling is an obvious example. I think the subsection would apply if "McGarry" appeared in place of "Megarry", as in other contexts it often has: but it would be otherwise if the substitute were "Allen" or "Goff". The likelihood of the recipient being deceived or misled

C would also be an important factor.

In the present case, however, counsel for the Crown points out that it would be wrong to divorce the word "agents", as the description of the income assessable, from the taxpayer company "as agents for" the Kaiapoi company, as the description of the person assessed: and, I would add, the reference to "£80,000" as the amount of the assessment should also be included. One may

D ask whether an assessment of £80,000 on the taxpayer company as agents for the Kaiapoi company is so gross and misleading an error as to be incapable of cure under s. 514 merely because the income assessable is described as "agents". In my judgment, one has only to ask the question for it to answer itself. The commissioners rightly gave short shrift to the taxpayer company's contention on this point: what I give, though longer in words, is shorter in spirit.

DURHAM FANCY GOODS, LTD. v. MICHAEL JACKSON (FANCY GOODS), LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Donaldson, J.), May 3, 29, 1968.]

G Company—Name—Use of name—Bill of exchange—Incorrect description of drawee company by drawer—Acceptance signed by director of drawee company on bill containing incorrect description—Whether director personally liable for amount of bill—Whether plaintiffs estopped from enforcing liability—Companies Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6 c. 38), s. 108 (1) (c), (4).

H The plaintiff company drew a ninety-day bill of exchange on a company whose correct name was "Michael Jackson (Fancy Goods), Ltd.", but which was referred to in the bill and the form of acceptance prepared by the plaintiff company as "M. Jackson (Fancy Goods), Ltd.". J., a director and the secretary of the drawee company at the time, signed the acceptance of the bill without correcting the error in the name of his company. The bill was dishonoured on maturity, J. having severed his connexion with the drawee company and it having gone into liquidation. In an action in which I it was sought to make J. personally liable on the bill by virtue of s. 108* of the Companies Act, 1948,

Held: although the name attributed to the drawee company in the bill of exchange was a misdescription and J., by signing the bill on behalf of the drawee company, had contravened s. 108 of the Companies Act, 1948, and rendered himself personally liable under that section on the bill, the plaintiff company was estopped from enforcing that liability, since they themselves were responsible for the wrong description and had impliedly represented that they would treat acceptance in that form as being regular and not giving rise to personal liability (see p. 990, letter F, and p. 991, letter E, post).

Per CURIAM: although the plaintiff company was estopped, the civil liability created by s. 108 would have been available to any other holder who was unaffected by the equitable defence (see p. 991, letter E, post).

[Editorial Note. It may be emphasised that there was no pre-existing contractual relationship between the director of the drawee company who signed the acceptance and the plaintiff company, so that the principle stated by LORD CAIRNS is extended in the present case to a non-contractual relationship (see p. 991, letter B, post).

Action.

This was an action brought by Durham Fancy Goods, Ltd., on a bill of exchange, dated Sept. 18, 1967, drawn on the defendant company but in the name M. Jackson (Fancy Goods), Ltd., and signed by Mr. Michael Jackson, the second defendant, by way of acceptance of the bill. The defendant company was in compulsory liquidation. The facts are set out in the judgment.

J. S. Hobhouse for the plaintiffs.

K. S. Rokison for the second defendant, Mr. Michael Jackson.

The first defendants, the company, were not represented.

May 29. DONALDSON, J., read the following judgment: This is a cautionary tale which should, perhaps, be required reading for all directors of companies.

Michael Jackson and Florence Jackson were the sole directors and shareholders of a Manchester company, Michael Jackson (Fancy Goods), Ltd., to whom I will refer as "Jacksons". Mr. Jackson was also the company secretary. Durham Fancy Goods, Ltd., the plaintiffs, a London company, had business dealings with Jacksons who, in the course of those dealings, were variously referred to as "Michael Jackson (Fancy Goods), Ltd.", their proper name, and as "M. Jackson (Fancy Goods), Ltd.". The nomenclature adopted at any particular point of time was fortuitous and devoid of significance to anyone concerned.

A On Sept. 18, 1967, the plaintiffs drew a ninety-day bill of exchange on Jacksons, no doubt in settlement of a business transaction. It was drawn on the printed letter paper of the plaintiffs and the following words were typed on the right hand side of the paper:

“£740 17s. 6d. 18.9.67. At 90 (ninety) days after date pay to our order the sum of seven hundred and forty pounds seventeen shillings and sixpence only for value received. For and on behalf of DURHAM FANCY GOODS, LTD.”

B Then there was a sixpenny stamp cancelled with an illegible signature, and the bill continued: “To: M. Jackson (Fancy Goods), Ltd., 263, Bury New Road, Manchester”. On the left hand side of the paper the following words were typed:

“Accepted payable: Westminster Bank, Ltd., 110, Regent Road, Salford,

C 5. For and on behalf of M. JACKSON (FANCY GOODS), LTD., Manchester.”

This was the form of the draft when it left the plaintiffs and when it was received by Jacksons. On receiving it, Mr. Jackson added his signature in the appropriate place, namely below the words “For and on behalf of M. Jackson (Fancy Goods), Ltd., Manchester” and returned the bill to the plaintiffs. The bill should have been honoured not later than Dec. 20, 1967, but before that date both Michael D Jackson and Florence Jackson sold all their shares in Jacksons and resigned from their respective positions as director/secretary and director. The bill was dishonoured on maturity and Jacksons are now in liquidation.

Thus far, I am confident, neither the plaintiffs, Jacksons nor Mr. Michael Jackson had ever given a thought to s. 108 of the Companies Act, 1948, if indeed any of them had ever heard of it. In this they were surely not alone. However, E that happy state did not continue and the plaintiffs, in reliance on the section, now contend that when Mr. Michael Jackson signed the form of acceptance prepared by them he committed a criminal offence punishable with a fine of up to £50 and, more important, he made himself personally liable on the bill. Exercising their new found knowledge of the law, they say that he should either have returned the bill to them with a request that they re-address it to Michael Jackson (Fancy F Goods), Ltd., and amend the form of acceptance or he should have accepted it “M. Jackson (Fancy Goods), Ltd., p.p. Michael Jackson (Fancy Goods), Ltd., Michael Jackson”.

Section 108 of the Companies Act, 1948, has a respectable pedigree which can be traced back at least as far as The Joint Stock Companies Act, 1856, but there has been no reported case on the topic for over half a century. The section, so far G as it is material, is in the following terms:

“108. (1) Every company— . . . (c) shall have its name mentioned in legible characters . . . in all bills of exchange . . . signed by or on behalf of the company . . . (4) If an officer of the company or any person on its behalf— . . . (b) . . . signs . . . on behalf of the company any bill of exchange . . . wherein H its name is not mentioned in manner aforesaid . . . he shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £50, and shall further be personally liable to the holder of the bill of exchange . . . for the amount thereof unless it is duly paid by the company.”

Counsel for Mr. Jackson submits that there was sufficient compliance with the section in the present case because (a) the bill made it clear that the acceptors I were a limited company and (b) there was no confusion as to their identity. In support of the first of these submissions he relied on Penrose v. Martyr (1), in which CROMPTON, J., stated that the purpose of the corresponding statutory provision and on the judgment of SCRUTTON, J., in Stacey & Co., Ltd. v. Wallis (2), A affirming this view and deciding that "Ltd." was an acceptable abbreviation for "Limited". Unfortunately for Mr. Jackson, the second submission is unsupported by authority. Indeed it is contrary to the tenor of the decision of DENMAN, J., and of the Court of Appeal in Atkins v. Wardle (3). There the drawer of the bill was a shareholder in "The South Shields Salt Water Baths Company Limited" B but he drew on "Salt Water Baths Company Limited, South Shields" and the directors accepted on behalf of "South Shields Salt Water Baths Co." which was equally incorrect. No question of confusion as to identity or as to the status of the drawers as a limited liability company could have arisen. Nevertheless the directors were held to be personally liable, LORD ESHER, M.R., pointing out that the statute did not require the misdescription to be material.

“was to prevent persons from being deceived into the belief that they had a security with the unlimited liability of common law, when they had but the security of a company limited . . .”

Counsel for Mr. Jackson also submitted that just as "Ltd." was an acceptable C abbreviation for "Limited", so "M" was an acceptable abbreviation for "Michael". This I do not accept. The word "Limited" is included in a company's name by way of description and not identification. Accordingly a generally accepted abbreviation will serve this purpose as well as the word in full. The rest of the name, by contrast, serves as a means of identification and may be compounded of or include initials or abbreviations. The use of any abbreviation of D the registered name is calculated to create problems of identification which are not created by an abbreviation of "Limited". I should therefore be prepared to hold that no abbreviation was permissible of any part of a company's name other than "Ltd." for "Limited" and, possibly, the ampersand for "and". However it is not necessary to go as far as this. Any abbreviation must convey the full word unambiguously and the initial "M" neither shows that it is an abbreviation E nor does it convey "Michael".

I have therefore no doubt that Mr. Jackson committed an offence under s. 108 of the Act of 1948, although a court might well decide to impose no penalty. I have also no doubt that he is liable to the plaintiffs who are admitted to be the holders of the bill of exchange since this is what the statute says; but can the plaintiffs enforce that liability? That is a different question. F

This case is distinguished from all previous cases under the earlier statutory versions of the section in that here it was the holders of the bill of exchange who inscribed the words of acceptance, who chose the wrong words and who now seek to rely on their own error, coupled it is true with the defendant's failure to detect and remedy it, as entitling them to relief. Common sense and justice seem to me to dictate that they shall fail. If I am right, thus far I should be surprised if G the law compelled me to find in the plaintiffs' favour because, contrary to popular belief, the law, justice and common sense are not unrelated concepts.

In my judgment the principle of equity on which the promissory estoppel cases are based is applicable to and bars the plaintiffs' claim. This principle was formulated by LORD CAIRNS, L.C., in Hughes v. Metropolitan Ry. Co. (4), in these words: H

"... it is the first principle upon which all courts of equity proceed if parties, who have entered into definite and distinct terms involving certain legal results, certain penalties, or legal forfeiture, afterwards by their own act, or with their own consent, enter on a course of negotiation which has the effect of leading one of the parties to suppose that the strict rights arising under the contract will not be enforced, or will be kept in suspense, or I held in abeyance, that the person who otherwise might have enforced these rights will not be allowed to enforce them where it would be inequitable, having regard to the dealings which have taken place between the parties."

The application of this principle has been the subject of criticism in relation to commercial transactions when there has been no more than acts of indulgence

A 'see speech of Viscount SIMONDS in Tool Metal Manufacturing Co., Ltd. v. Tungsten Electric Co., Ltd. (5)), and there are various other limitations on its application in relation to statutory provisions (see 15 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.), p. 176, para. 345) but none of these considerations seems to me to apply to the present case.

B LORD CAIRNS in his enunciation of the principle assumed a pre-existing contractual relationship between the parties, but this does not seem to me to be essential, provided that there is a pre-existing legal relationship which could in certain circumstances give rise to liabilities and penalties. Such a relationship is created by (a) s. 108 of the Companies Act, 1948, (b) the fact that Mr. Jackson was a director of Jacksons and (c) whatever contractual arrangement existed between the plaintiffs and Jacksons which led to the plaintiffs drawing a ninety day bill on Jacksons. The relevant liability is to guarantee the payment of the bill at maturity, contingent on its being accepted by Mr. Jackson on Jacksons' behalf without mentioning their name on the bill. Against this background, the plaintiffs did not, as one would have expected, send the bill to Jacksons without words of acceptance, but instead inscribed words of acceptance including a name which was deceptively similar to, but not the same as, that of Jacksons. In saying that D the name was deceptively similar, I intend only to state what is an obvious fact and wish to emphasise that no deception was intended by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs thereby implied that acceptance of the bill in that form would be, or would be accepted by them as, a regular acceptance of the bill. Such an acceptance would not, of course, have involved Mr. Jackson in personal liability. In these circumstances it would be inequitable that the plaintiffs should be allowed E to enforce the statutory liability of Mr. Jackson without first giving him an opportunity of regularising the acceptance by inscribing the correct name of Jacksons on the bill and that it is now too late to do. Accordingly the plaintiffs are unable to enforce the statutory liability, although it continues to exist and would have been available to other holders, who were unaffected by the equitable defence.

I have been tempted to explore the possibility that the same result could be F reached without the intervention of equity by the application of the common law principle that when an act is done by one person at the request of another—a bill is accepted by Mr. Jackson in a special form at the request of the plaintiffs—and the act is not manifestly tortious to the knowledge of the person doing it and such an act turns out to be injurious, the person doing it is entitled to an indemnity from him who requested that it should be done (see Sheffield Corpn. v. Barclay (6), per THE EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., and Dawson Line, Ltd. v. Aktiengesellschaft Adler Für Chemische Industrie of Berlin (7), per SCRUTTON, L.J.). The existence of such an implied indemnity would give rise to a defence of circuity of action. However, the point not having been argued, I must and do resist the temptation.

H For the reasons given, I consider that the plaintiffs' claim fails. Had it succeeded, I should have had to consider a claim by the plaintiffs for interest and should have awarded simple interest on the sum claimed from Dec. 20, 1967, until judgment at a rate of one per cent. in excess of the Bank of England official discount rate from time to time in force during this period.

Application.

The applicant, Kevan Hugh Clark, was sentenced by a district court-martial in Germany to 112 days' detention. On Mar. 28, 1968, the Uxbridge justices imposed on him a sentence of six months' imprisonment for an offence of obtaining £27 15s. by false pretences. Application was now made on behalf of the applicant by motion for certiorari to quash the sentence of six months' imprisonment on the ground that the justices had been bound to make an order suspending the sentence, and the question arose for determination whether the justices were functus officio or could substitute a suspended sentence.

M. Hill for the applicant.

The respondent was not represented.

LORD PARKER, C.J.: 'The justices announced their sentence of six months' imprisonment believing that they had power to do so. Having done that they were reminded that under the Criminal Justice Act 1967 (1), since the only detention had been pursuant to a district court-martial in Germany when he was ordered to serve 112 days' detention, the sentence of six months had to be suspended. There was then an argument whether the justices having realised they had given an illegal sentence were functus officio or could substitute a proper sentence. They were asked to adjourn so that an application could be made to this court, which has been done.

This court is quite satisfied that the justices were in fact functus officio and that the present case comes within the line of cases of which R. v. Willesden Justices, Ex p. Utley (2) is one, rather than the case to which the justices refer of R. v. Marsham, Ex p. Pethick Lawrence (3), the reason being that in the former case there had been a perfectly proper hearing, whereas in the latter case the hearing itself had been a nullity. As the result of s. 16 of the Administration of Justice Act, 1960, this court has now power to substitute a valid sentence rather than what

SCOTT v. BAKER.

C [QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Parker, C.J., Waller and Fisher, JJ.), May 14, 1968.]

Road Traffic—Driving with blood-alcohol proportion above prescribed limit—Evidence—Provision of specimen—Breath test—Device by means of which test carried out to be approved by Secretary of State—Whether maxim omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta sufficient to establish prima facie case—Road Safety Act 1967 (c. 30) s. 1 (1), s. 2 (4), (7), s. 7 (1).

D A police constable stopped a motor car driven by the respondent, having formed the opinion that it was exceeding the speed limit. The respondent's breath smelt of alcohol, so the constable asked him to submit to a breath test in accordance with s. 2 (1)* of the Road Safety Act 1967. The respondent
E consented to the test, which proved positive, whereupon the constable arrested him under s. 2 (4)* of the Act of 1967. He was taken to a police station where, in accordance with s. 2 (7)* of the Act of 1967, he was offered and consented to take a second breath test, which also proved positive. A blood specimen was thereupon taken in accordance with s. 3 (1)† of the Act of 1967, which on analysis, was shown to contain alcohol in excess of the F prescribed limit. On an information against the respondent that he drove a motor car having consumed alcohol in such a quantity that the proportion in his blood exceeded the prescribed limit, contrary to s. 1 (1)‡ of the Act of 1967, the justices upheld a submission on behalf of the respondent that there had been no proof by the prosecution that the device used by the
G constable was of a type which had the approval§ of the Secretary of State which was required by s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1967|| and dismissed the information. On appeal by the prosecutor, it being conceded that Home Office circular 157/1967 on Part 1 of the Road Safety Act 1967 was not admissible as evidence of approval of the device used to test the respondent's breath,

Held: the information had been rightly dismissed for the following reasons—

H (i) where a person was charged with an offence against s. 1 of the Road Safety Act 1967 (of which he could be guilty only if the excessive alcohol proportion in his blood were ascertained from a specimen provided under s. 3) the offence was not established unless it was shown that the specimen had been provided in accordance with s. 3 (see p. 998, letter G, p. 1000, letter G, and p. 1001, letter G, post).

I (ii) in the circumstances of the present case a specimen was not provided in accordance with s. 3 unless the person had been arrested in accordance with s. 2 (4), viz., after a first breath test, and unless he had been given opportunity in accordance with s. 2 (7) to have a second breath test; for which purposes the breath test must have been carried out by means of a device of a type approved by the Secretary of State (see p. 998, letter E, p. 1000, letter G, and p. 1001, letter G, post), and

(iii) in the present case it was not established as a fact that the device was of an approved type (see p. 998, letter A, p. 1000, letter G, and p. 1001, letter G, post), and the presumption omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta did not so apply as to enable a prima facie case to be established in a criminal prosecution merely by showing that breath test devices had been issued to the police and that the device used in the present case was a device so issued, when the question of approval was raised in defence (see p. 999, letters D and F, p. 1000, letter F, and p. 1001, letters E and G, post).

[Editorial Note. Although the device is now approved by two short orders (The Breath Test Device (Approval) (No. 1) Order 1968, which approves the device known as the Alcotest supplied to police forces in England and Wales and the Breath Test Device (Approval) (No. 2) Order 1968, which approves the same device supplied to members of the provost staff (as defined in s. 6 (3) of the Road Safety Act 1967), which identify the device approved, the ratio decidendi in the present case on the effect of the requirement in s. 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967 that the proportion of alcohol in the accused's blood be ascertained from a specimen provided under s. 3 remains generally applicable, with the consequence that, where s. 3 (1) applies, conditions for arrest under s. 2 must be shown to be satisfied before the offence is established. This reasoning, of course, is applicable to the particular offence created by s. 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967; but it would not be applicable where the charge was laid under the previously existing statute law which created the offence of driving while unfit to drive through drink (Road Traffic Act, 1960, s. 6); see p. 998, letter F, post.

Case Stated.

This was a Case Stated by justices for the county of Leicester in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Loughborough on Jan. 24, 1968. On Dec. 5, 1967, the respondent, Alan Victor Baker, was charged by the appellant, John Kevin Scott, a chief inspector of police, that, on Nov. 12, 1967, he drove a motor car on Leicester Road, Loughborough, in the county of Leicester, having consumed alcohol in such a quantity that the proportion in his blood exceeded the prescribed limit, contrary to s. 1 of the Road Safety Act 1967 (hereafter called "the Act"). Evidence was adduced on behalf of the appellant in support of the following facts. On Nov. 12, 1967, a constable on Leicester Road, Loughborough (which was a public highway situate in a built up area), stopped a car driven by the respondent, having formed the opinion that its speed exceeded thirty miles per hour. Since the respondent's breath smelt of alcohol, the constable asked him to submit to a breath test; he consented to the test which proved positive. The device used was deposited to have been an "Alcotest 80" as manufactured by Draeger Normalair, Ltd. The respondent was arrested under s. 2 of the Act and taken to Loughborough police station where he was offered, and consented to take, a second breath test on a device deposited to have been similarly

A named which also proved positive. In consequence, a blood specimen was duly taken from him by a doctor which, on analysis, was shown to contain alcohol in excess of the prescribed limit. Police Inspector George deposed that in the custody of the office of the chief constable of the Leicester and Rutland constabulary lay a circular letter purporting to have issued from the Home Office and to be addressed to chief constables which he produced from such custody.

B Paragraph 44 of the Schedule thereto stated that the "Alcotest" device had been approved by the Secretary of State, and para. 45 expressed the view that the notification to chief constables by circular of such approval should be sufficient evidence thereof.

After the appellant had closed his case, it was submitted to the justices on behalf of the respondent that the evidence so adduced was insufficient in law to support a conviction on the information in that: (i) a "breath test" was defined in s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1967 as a test "... by means of a device of a type approved for the purpose of such a test by the Secretary of State ...". The Act was a penal Act which involved the liberty of the subject and strict proof of approval (the onus whereof lay on the prosecution) was a pre-requisite of conviction. The circular to chief constables by itself had no evidential value; (ii) s. 1 of the Act created a criminal offence if the respondent had driven having in his blood a higher concentration of alcohol than the prescribed limit, such concentration having been ascertained by means of a laboratory test on a specimen provided under s. 3 of the Act. Such specimen of blood or urine might be required under s. 3 of the Act from him, if, having been arrested in conformity with s. 2 (1) (b) and (4) of the Act, he had previously been given an opportunity at the police station to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test under s. 2 (7) of the Act. It was clear that only if that procedure had been adopted might the specimen be required of him under s. 3 of the Act, and a specimen otherwise obtained was not "a specimen provided under s. 3 of the Act"; (iii) in default of proper proof that the devices used in the present case (and in particular that device used at the police station) were of an approved type, the justices were not entitled to convict on the bare ground that, in a blood specimen taken from the respondent, there was found to be an alcohol content in excess of the prescribed limit, for the specimen would not then be a specimen "provided under s. 3". It was submitted to the justices on behalf of the prosecutor that—(a) the blood specimen contained an excess of alcohol over the prescribed limit. It, therefore, mattered not whether the devices used for the breath tests were, or were not, of an approved type, because the very existence of such an excess made irrelevant any reference to the preliminaries which ought to have led to the taking of the sample. There were numerous precedents for the admission of evidence obtained where procedural pre-requisites were unproved or had been disregarded; (b) the justices should assume from the fact of its issue to and use by the police that the type of device had been in fact duly approved, and no supporting evidence of approval needed to be adduced at all. In the alternative sufficient publicity had been given to the device for them to take judicial notice of its approval; (c) if, per contra, any proof at all were required, it was sufficiently evidenced and was proved to the justices by the production of the circular letter from its proper custody; (d) the Act contained no guidance, and the Secretary of State was entitled to indicate his approval of a type of device in any way that he chose.

I

On the conclusion of the argument and before the justices adjudicated on the submission (being conscious of the serious inconveniences which would flow should it be well founded), they invited the prosecution to consider whether, in the light of the submission, an adjournment should be requested so as to enable any further or better evidence of approval of the type of device to be adduced; because the justices considered that, since the alleged want of proof touched only a formal matter, the prosecution would be entitled to an adjournment for that purpose, notwithstanding that they had closed their case. An adjournment was not requested, but the prosecution asked the justices to adjudicate. The justices adjourned to consider their decision. On Jan. 31, 1968, no application was made to the justices by the appellant's solicitor to adduce any further evidence that the type of device had been approved before they had adjudicated. The justices informed the parties that it then appeared that, in the files of their court, had for some time lain another document purporting to be a circular letter, No. 157/1967, addressed to clerks of assize, clerks of the peace and to justices clerks from the Home Office, wherein para. 39 stated that the "Alcotest" device supplied by Draeger Normalair, Ltd. had been approved by the Secretary of State; and since the existence of this circular letter had not been within their knowledge or that of the parties at the former hearing, they invited the parties to argue whether or not they must, or should, or could then take cognisance of it, and what (if they did) was its probative value (if any). The prosecutor stood on his former reply. It was submitted for the respondent that if (which he contested) the justices were entitled to take cognisance of that circular letter at that stage of the proceedings or at all, its production fell as short as did that of the other circular letter (a first circular letter to, among others, clerks to justices) of constituting that proper evidence of approval which was an essential pre-requisite of conviction, and, that in fact the second circular letter in an evidential sense proved nothing*.

The justices dismissed the information, and the appellant now appealed.

LORD PARKER, C.J.: Before dealing with the facts of this case, it is, I think, convenient to look at the relevant provisions of the Road Safety Act 1967. I begin with s. 2, which, so far as material, provides:

"(1) A constable in uniform may require any person driving or attempting to drive a motor vehicle on a road or other public place to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test there or nearby, if the constable has reasonable cause . . . (b) to suspect him of having committed a traffic offence while the vehicle was in motion . . .

"(3) A person who, without reasonable excuse, fails to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test under either of the two foregoing subsections shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £50.

"(4) If it appears to a constable in consequence of a breath test carried out by him on any person under sub-s. (1) or (2) of this section that the device by means of which the test is carried out indicates that the proportion of alcohol in that person's blood exceeds the prescribed limit, the constable may arrest that person without warrant . . .

"(5) If a person required by a constable under sub-s. (1) or (2) of this section to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test fails to do so and the constable has reasonable cause to suspect him of having alcohol in his body, the constable may arrest him without warrant . . .

"(7) A person arrested under this section or under . . . s. 6 (4) [of the Road Traffic Act, 1960] shall, while at a police station, be given an opportunity to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test there . . ."

A Section 3 (1) of the Act of 1967 provides that:

" A person who has been arrested under the last foregoing section or s. 6 (4) of the [Road Traffic Act, 1960] may, while at a police station, be required by a constable to provide a specimen for a laboratory test (which may be a specimen of blood or of urine), if he has previously been given an opportunity to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test at that station under sub-s. (7) of the last foregoing section, and . . . (a) it appears to a constable in consequence of the breath test that the device by means of which the test is carried out indicates that the proportion of alcohol in his blood exceeds the prescribed limit . . . "

Finally, so far as Part I is concerned, s. 1 (1) provides that:

" If a person drives or attempts to drive a motor vehicle on a road or other public place, having consumed alcohol in such a quantity that the proportion thereof in his blood, as ascertained from a laboratory test for which he subsequently provides a specimen under s. 3 of this Act, exceeds the prescribed limit at the time he provides the specimen, he shall be liable . . . " and so on. Section 7 (1) provides that:

" . . . ' the prescribed limit ' means 80 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood or such other proportion as may be prescribed by regulations made by statutory instrument by the Minister ", and " breath test " is defined in s. 7 (1) as

" a test for the purpose of obtaining an indication of the proportion of alcohol in a person's blood carried out, by means of a device of a type approved for the purpose of such a test by the Secretary of State, on a specimen of breath provided by that person."

What happened in the present case was that on Nov. 12, 1967, a constable in Loughborough stopped a motor car driven by the respondent, having formed the opinion that its speed exceeded thirty miles an hour. The respondent's breath smelt of alcohol, so the constable asked him to submit to a breath test; that he was entitled to do under s. 2 (1) which I have just read. He consented to the test, which proved positive. Thereupon, the constable, again as he was entitled to do under s. 2 (4), arrested the respondent; he was taken to a police station, and there he was offered and consented to take a second breath test, which also proved positive. Accordingly, s. 2 (7) was apparently complied with. Thereupon, a blood specimen was duly taken from the respondent by a doctor, which on analysis was shown to contain alcohol in excess of the prescribed limit. Those were the facts of this case, save that the constable deposed that the device used was known as an " Alcotest 80 " as manufactured by Draeger Normalair, Ltd. It was in those circumstances that, at the end of the prosecution case, the respondent's solicitor submitted to the justices that the evidence so adduced was insufficient to support a conviction, because, and this is the whole point, it was said that there had been no proof by the prosecution that the device in fact used by the constable was of a type which had been approved by the Secretary of State as provided in s. 7 (1). An adjournment was offered but refused by the prosecution.

That submission made on behalf of the respondent was challenged by the prosecution on three grounds: it was first of all said that there was proof of approval by the Secretary of State because a circular had been sent out from the Home Office purporting to have been made by the direction of the Secretary of State, which, in reference to s. 7, stated:

" One device has so far been approved by the Secretary of State, namely ' Alcotest ', supplied by Draeger Normalair, Ltd. of Blyth, Northumberland."

The circular then went on in circumstances which are somewhat naive to say:

"The notification to chief officers by circular that the Secretary of State has approved a particular device for the purpose of the Act should be sufficient evidence of the approval if this is required for court proceedings."

I say that that was a little naive because it is now conceded, and properly conceded, that this circular is not admissible at all as evidence of the approval, if any, by the Secretary of State. A similar circular in fact was sent to all courts of assize, quarter sessions and justices of the peace; but, equally, it is conceded that that is no evidence of the approval of the device used by the police officer.

The second point taken, though not in the order put forward, was really this, that the offence created by s. 1 was having in the blood a proportion of alcohol which exceeded the prescribed limit. Undoubtedly that was the case here; no challenge was made to the analysis, and the analysis clearly showed a proportion of alcohol in the blood which did exceed the prescribed limit. Accordingly, it was submitted to the justices and has been submitted to us here today that, that being the offence, it matters not if it be the fact that the preliminary tests, the breath tests, were not carried out lawfully in the sense that the device was not approved by the Secretary of State. Counsel for the appellant has referred us to cases which make it clear that evidence may be admissible notwithstanding that it has been obtained by improper means; but here it is not a question of admissibility but of construing s. 1, which itself creates the offence. That section provides that it shall only be an offence if the person drives a motor vehicle having consumed alcohol which is later shown to exceed the prescribed limit on the provision of a specimen under s. 3. If one goes to s. 3, it will be seen that there can, so far as the present case is concerned, be no provision of a specimen (1) under s. 3 unless the person has been arrested under s. 2 (4), which in turn can only be made after what I may call the first breath test; and, secondly, the specimen can only be provided if the person has been given an opportunity under s. 2 (7) to have a second breath test. It seems to me quite impossible to argue that a specimen was properly provided under s. 3, as it has to be before there is an offence, unless those matters have first been complied with. It may, of course, well be that, in the case of the principal Act, the Road Traffic Act, 1960, where a person has been charged, not of having a proportion of alcohol in his breath exceeding the prescribed limit but of driving when he is unfit to drive through alcohol, that the specimen provided then can be used, and properly used, to prove the offence, notwithstanding that there have been no breath tests prior thereto at all. But, so far as this offence is concerned, the offence created by s. 1 of the Act of 1967, I am quite clear that, before a person can be convicted, it must be shown that the specimen has been provided as laid down in s. 3.

The third point raised before the justices, and again taken before this court, was that, in fact, there was prima facie evidence at the end of the prosecution case that the device used by the constable in this case was a device of a type so approved. In order to substantiate that, that there was such prima facie evidence, counsel for the appellant has urged us to apply the well-known principle, and I need not deal with it in full, of omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta. He urges that here we have the Secretary of State, and nobody could suggest that he had not been validly appointed, a public officer charged with the power, and I would concede the duty, if the Act of 1967 is to be administered, of approving a device. Secondly, one finds officers of police throughout the country issued, and as the justices say this is notorious, with devices. Accordingly, it is said that, applying the presumption to which I have referred, the only proper inference is that

(1) On May 17, 1968, LORD PARKER, C.J., at the sitting of the court referred to this passage in his judgment in Scott v. Baker and stated that the reference to a specimen being only properly obtained under s. 3 of the Act of 1967 if the accused had been arrested under s. 2 (4) should not be read as an exclusive statement. It applied only to the particular facts in Scott v. Baker, and a specimen could properly be taken if the accused had been arrested under s. 2 (5) of the Act of 1967 or s. 6 (4) of the Road Traffic Act, 1960.

A prima facie the Secretary of State had approved this device. I think, for myself, that one ought to take very great care in a criminal case as to the length one goes in applying that presumption. It is important to see where one gets to. If I may for the moment go back to s. 2 (3), the subsection which makes it an offence without reasonable excuse to fail to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test on the spot, is it really to be said that without any proof it is to be presumed that the device which a constable has used has been approved by the Secretary of State? Counsel for the appellant has urged that different principles may apply in considering the offence under s. 2 (3) and that created by s. 1 (1). He would say in regard to the former that the approval by the Secretary of State was, as he puts it, central to the offence, whereas in dealing with s. 1 it is only in relation to a preliminary matter. In my judgment, that really brings one back to the argument to which I have previously referred, and if, as I think, it is fundamental to the offence created by s. 1 that there should have been valid breath tests, and a valid arrest, before a specimen of blood or urine is provided, then, as it seems to me, the approval of the Secretary of State is just as central to that offence as it is to the offence created by s. 1 (3).

When one analyses this question, one is faced with this: is it sufficient to raise a prima facie case of an offence under s. 1 (1) to point to s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1967, where a public officer is charged with a duty, and then to turn to the facts that breathalysers have been issued to the police, and that the constable on this occasion used a breathalyser so issued to him? In answering that question, I think that one should put out of one's mind, so far as it is possible, any repercussions which this decision might have in regard to those convicted of this offence in the early days. I say "in the early days" because steps have been taken, certainly on Feb. 9, 1968, and later, whereby the Secretary of State has sought to provide machinery whereby his approval can be adduced in evidence (2). I am not for my part making any ruling as to those who have been convicted prior to Feb. 9, 1968; it may well be that if, as is likely in most cases the point has never been taken at all, that will amount to an admission by the defence that the Secretary of State has approved the device in issue. Indeed, I think that that would be the natural inference if no point is taken. If, however, in any of those cases, as here, the point was taken, in other words, that there is an issue raised whether the device in question had been approved, then, as it seems to me and despite counsel for the appellants' argument, something more remains to be done, and that is to prove other than by way of a rebuttable presumption, because the presumption has been challenged, that approval was given to the type of device used.

There is not very much authority on this point, but the court has looked with some care at a decision of the Divisional Court, Boyd-Gibbins v. Skinner (3), a case which raised much the same sort of point as here. In that case, the defendant was convicted on an information preferred under s. 10 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, which charged him with driving a motor car on a road in a built up area at a speed exceeding thirty miles an hour. Under the Road Traffic Act, 1934, s. 1 (1), it was provided that a length of road shall be deemed to be a road in a built up area:

"(a) If a system of street lighting furnished by means of lamps placed not more than two hundred yards apart is provided thereon, . . . or (b) if a direction that it shall be deemed to be a road in a built up area is in force under this section; and not otherwise."

In fact, there was on the street in question no system of street lighting. Therefore, it was only a built up road, and an offence could only be committed if in fact a direction was in force that it should be deemed to be a road in a built up area.

(2) See the Breath Test Device (Approval) (No. 1) Order 1968, made on Feb. 9, 1968, and the Breath Test Device (Approval) (No. 2) Order 1968, made on Mar. 13, 1968.

(3) [1951] 1 All E.R. 1049; [1951] 2 K.B. 379.

On appeal to quarter sessions, quarter sessions allowed the appeal on the basis that it had not been proved that there was such a direction in force. On appeal by way of Case Stated to this court, the court allowed the appeal and remitted the Case to the justices, holding that there was in all the circumstances prima facie evidence that such a direction was in force. What had happened in that case was that, on this section of road, traffic signs had been put up; they were traffic signs of a type authorised by the Minister, and, further, by s. 1 (7) of the Act of 1934, it was the duty of the local authority to erect and maintain proper traffic signs in such positions as might be requisite in order to give effect to general or other directions given by the Minister for the purpose of securing that adequate guidance was given to drivers of motor vehicles, and so on. What this court held in that case was that the fact that there had been erected on this part of the road authorised traffic signs, the erection having taken place in fulfilment of the local authority's duty, raised prima facie evidence that this was a built up area. SELLERS, J., added this in a short judgment (4):

"Therefore, there are two authorities who are responsible [referring there to the Minister and the local authority] for putting up these necessary signs giving guidance to drivers. In those circumstances, . . . the signs in themselves provide sufficient prima facie evidence of the road being deemed to be in a built up area."

In my judgment, if one acceded to counsel for the appellant's argument in the present case, it would mean going further than this court went in Boyd-Gibbins v. Skinner (5). The facts, as it appears to me, of Boyd-Gibbins v. Skinner (5) are clearly different from the facts of this case in that there was a statutory duty on the local authority to erect signs, and signs were erected in pursuance of that statutory duty. In my judgment, it would be going a very long way in the present case to say that, because the police as public officers should act properly in the administration of the Act of 1967, therefore one can eliminate any question of mistake and assume that they are using a device which has properly been approved by the Secretary of State. After all, until the order of Feb. 9, 1968, nobody knew what, if any, device the Secretary of State had in fact approved. Bearing in mind that this is a criminal case, it seems to me that it would be going much too far to press the presumption of omnia praesumuntur to the length of saying that there was a prima facie case here that the device used was of a type approved by the Secretary of State. I think that the justices, in their very careful judgment and reasoning, came to a correct conclusion and I would dismiss this appeal.

WALLER, J.: I agree. I would only add this because at one time I did feel misgivings about the effect of Boyd-Gibbins v. Skinner (5) that the line to be drawn seems to me to be a fine one. In Boyd-Gibbins v. Skinner (5), there was cited in favour of the argument for the appellant Swift v. Barrett (6). That was a case where a driver was charged with contravening s. 49 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, by failing to conform to the direction given by a traffic sign, and where the prosecution had not proved that the sign was of the prescribed size, colour and type. The motor driver had been convicted and on appeal to this court the appeal was allowed. HILBERY, J., one of the members of the court saying (7):

"According to the Case Stated, all that was proved by the prosecution was that there was placed on or near the road in question a sign for regulating the movement of traffic, namely a 'Halt at major road ahead' sign . . . The offence which they were charging was not merely that the appellant had disregarded a 'Halt at major road ahead' sign, which does not of itself

A constitute an offence. The appellant was charged with having disregarded such a sign which had been lawfully placed on or near the road. There was a breakdown in the chain of evidence, which could easily have been repaired by the production of the regulation under which the sign was placed on or near the road, and the testimony of a constable that the sign had been placed at the particular spot was in accordance with the regulation. There was no
B practical difficulty in supplying the link in the chain, but, having omitted to supply it, the prosecution should have failed."

In Boyd-Gibbins v. Skinner (8), which was decided in the opposite way, namely, that there was a presumption, it seems to me that there were three differences, firstly, as LORD PARKER, C.J., has already pointed out, the duty was cast both on the local authority and on the Minister in that case; secondly, it was a case
C where it was obvious to the public passing by that there were the two signs indicating that there was a speed limit; and, thirdly, and this clearly was a matter which influenced LORD GODDARD, C.J., it would have been a very grave inconvenience to everybody who was ever prosecuted under that regulation if evidence had to be called for local authorities to prove the precise position of a particular piece of road. The inconvenience to other defendants would have been great, and those
D matters appear to have influenced the court in coming to the conclusion which they did. In this case there was no duty; in this case, if one asks oneself at the end of the prosecution case whether there is a prima facie case that a device of the type approved for the purpose of such test by the Secretary of State was used, one is left in a state of complete doubt, one's mind not moving one side or the other of doubt, there being no prima facie case one way or the other. In my
E view, therefore, for that reason I agree with what LORD PARKER, C.J., has already said.

I would only add this on the question of the repercussions of this case. It does seem to me that this question only arises where it has been clearly raised before the justices. In this case, a great point was made before the justices that this particular question had not been proved, and it does appear to me that there will
F not be much comfort to be derived from this case to those who have already been convicted of this offence under the law as it was up to Feb. 7, 1968, unless this specific issue was raised.

FISHER, J.: I agree with the judgment delivered by LORD PARKER, C.J., and there is nothing which I can usefully add.

CARL-ZEISS-STIFTUNG v. HERBERT SMITH & CO. (a firm) AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Lord Denning, M.R., Diplock and Sachs, L.J.J.), May 22, 23, 1968.]

Practice—Preliminary point of law—Test whether preliminary issue should be ordered—Decisive of litigation if point of law decided one way—Action by East German company against West German company—Claim by East German company against solicitors acting for West German company in respect of money for fees and disbursements received by solicitors in good faith from West German company—Preliminary issue ordered.

The plaintiff, a corporate entity carrying on business in East Germany, brought an action in England against another organisation of the same name carrying on business in West Germany, claiming that the West German company had been guilty of passing off and infringing trade marks and, in addition, that all the property and assets of the West German company belonged to the plaintiff. The plaintiff brought a separate action against the defendants, two firms of solicitors acting for the West German company in the main action, claiming that the defendants were liable to pay over all the moneys that they had received from the West German company for fees, costs and disbursements. On appeal from a refusal to order trial of a preliminary issue on a point of law in the action against the solicitors,

Held: the test whether the trial of a preliminary issue on a point of law should be directed was whether the point of law, if decided in one way, would be decisive of the litigation, and the point of law in the present case would dispose of the claim against the solicitors irrespective of the decision in the main action; accordingly the question of law whether the defendant solicitors would be accountable to the plaintiff in respect of fees, costs or disbursements received by them in good faith in their capacity as solicitors for the defendants in the main action should be tried as a preliminary issue (see p. 1004, letters D, E and I, post).

Interlocutory Appeal.

This was an appeal by the defendants, Herbert Smith & Co. and Dehn & Lauderdale, two firms of solicitors, from a judgment of PENNYCUICK, J., dated May 8, 1968, whereby he made no order on motion by the defendants under R.S.C., Ord. 33, r. 3, that a point of law, whether the defendants and each of them would be accountable to the plaintiff, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung, a corporate entity carrying on business in East Germany, in respect of fees, costs and disbursements received by them, and each of them, from Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of West Germany,

A should be tried as a preliminary issue, in the present action by the plaintiff against the defendants. The main action, which was brought by the East German company against the West German company and two English companies, was begun by writ issued on Oct. 20, 1955 (cf., Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Rayner and Keeler, Ltd. (No 2), [1966] 2 All E.R. at p. 541, letter E). Trial of it was expected to take place in the autumn of 1969. The present action was begun by writ issued on Mar. 18, 1968. In the present action the East German company claimed that the defendants were liable to account to the East German company for moneys received from the West German company, on the ground that, as the East German company alleged, all assets and moneys arising from the trade or business conducted by the West German company or persons purporting to instruct the defendant solicitors on behalf of Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung were the property of the East German company, the trade or business having been (so it was alleged) obtained without consideration and the persons managing it in West Germany acting (so it was alleged) in breach of fiduciary obligation to the East German company.

The authority and cases noted below* were cited during the argument in addition to the cases referred to in the judgment of LORD DENNING, M.R.

D Michael Kerr, Q.C., C. J. Slade, Q.C., and G. Slynne for the defendants.
D. W. Falconer, Q.C., and Jeremiah Harman, Q.C., for the plaintiff.

LORD DENNING, M.R.: This is a claim by the plaintiff, a company which is called Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung. It is a corporate entity, but that is all that is admitted about it. It carries on business in East Germany. It brings this action against the defendants, two firms of solicitors, Herbert Smith & Co., and Dehn & Lauderdale. The claim arises in this way. There is another organisation which is also called Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung. It carries on business in West Germany. The plaintiff, the Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of East Germany, has brought an action against the Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung of West Germany. The plaintiff claims that the West German company has been guilty of passing off, infringing trade marks, and so forth. In addition, by an amendment, the plaintiff claims that all the property and assets of the West German company belong to the plaintiff. That is the main action. It is an action on a colossal scale. It has been going on for years. It will not come on for trial in the most optimistic circumstances until some time in 1969.

In this present action, the plaintiff makes a claim against the defendants, the solicitors who have acted for the West German company. The plaintiff says that the defendants must pay over to the plaintiff all the moneys which they have received from their clients, the West German company, for fees and disbursements. The plaintiff says that all these moneys belonged to it and that the defendants are accountable as constructive trustees, or something of the kind. The plaintiff first put forward its claim in a letter of Jan. 10, 1968. It made the first defendants very anxious. They had already received large sums for costs; and there were very large sums which were going to be incurred in carrying on this action. It was a great risk for them to go on with this claim hanging over them. They wrote back on Mar. 8, 1968:

“... the fact that this claim has been made and is being maintained renders our clients' position in this litigation extremely difficult, if not impossible.”

I They said that they would have to apply to the court; but, before the first defendants applied to the court, the plaintiff brought this action against them.

The defendants now ask that a preliminary issue be tried so as to decide whether they are liable for moneys which they received from their clients honestly on account of their fees and disbursements. They point out that they cannot safely conduct the litigation for the West Germany company with this risk, and, I might almost say, this threat, hanging over their heads. The judge refused to order a preliminary issue. He said that the main action should be fought out to its conclusion before the trial judge; and that then this second action against the defendants should be tried before the same judge. I am afraid that I cannot agree with the judge's decision. The defendants ought to know where they stand. They should be able to conduct the litigation without having a sword suspended over their heads. It is not a hypothetical issue. It is a practical issue of urgency. It is very desirable that it should be decided as soon as possible before many further costs are incurred. I know that it has been said on one or two occasions that a preliminary issue should be ordered only when, whichever way it is decided, it is conclusive of the whole matter. That was said by LORD EVERSHED, M.R., in Windsor Refrigerator Co., Ltd. v. Branch Nominees, Ltd. (1); and by HARMAN, L.J., in Yeoman Credit, Ltd. v. Latter (2). I do not think that that is correct. The true rule was stated by ROMER, L.J., in Everett v. Ribbands (3):

"Where there is a point of law which, if decided in one way, is going to be decisive of the litigation, advantage ought to be taken of the facilities afforded by the rules of court to have it disposed of at the close of pleadings or very shortly afterwards."

I have always understood such to be the practice. I quite agree that, in many cases, the facts and law are so mixed up that it is very undesirable to have a preliminary issue. I always like to know the facts before deciding the law; but this is an exceptional case. The defendants have received in good faith moneys for the defence of this action. They ought to know at once whether they can safely go on receiving them. If the issue of law is decided in their favour, it will dispose of the claim against them, irrespective of the main action. I would order a preliminary issue to be tried. It is stated in a letter of May 17, 1968, with complete accuracy:

"That irrespective of the decision upon any issue in the action 1955 C. No. 4445 [the main action] referred to in the pleadings herein, neither of the defendants herein would be accountable to the plaintiff in respect of any fees, costs or disbursements received by them from or on behalf of the defendants in that action so long as the defendants herein act honestly as solicitors on behalf of the said defendants, and receive such fees, costs and disbursements in their said capacity of solicitors."

It was said that this issue is a serious issue which may go to the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords, and not be disposed of for a long time. That does not trouble me. It can, and should, be decided with expedition in every court. It can and should, be decided on the first day of next term in the Chancery Division; and, being an interlocutory matter, it can be brought on here within another week. It can be decided by next month.

I would allow this appeal and order the preliminary point in the terms set out in that letter.

DIPLOCK, L.J.: I agree.

SACHS, L.J.: I entirely agree.

WEST PENWITH RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. GUNNELL AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Willmer, Davies and Edmund Davies, L.JJ.), April 25, 1968.]

B County Court—Jurisdiction—Mortgage—Possession—Whether jurisdiction over an action for possession is that applicable to an action for recovery of land or for enforcement of the mortgage—County Courts Act, 1959 (7 & 8 Eliz. 2 c. 22), s. 48 (1), s. 52 (1) (c).

Mortgagees by demise of premises, whose annual value for rating was below £400, brought an action for possession in the county court based on the mortgagors' default in payments under the mortgage. The amount due on the mortgage exceeded £500.

Held: the action lay under s. 48 (1)* of the County Courts Act, 1959, viz., under the jurisdiction in actions for recovery of land, notwithstanding that the jurisdiction in equity under s. 52 (1) (c)† for enforcing any charge was limited to cases where the amount owing in respect of the charge did not exceed £500 (see p. 1007, letter B, and p. 1008, letters C and F, post).

Appeal.

By a mortgage dated June 4, 1965, between the defendants, Kenneth George Percy Gunnell and Jean Marjory Gunnell, his wife, of the one part and the plaintiffs, the Rural District Council of West Penwith, the defendants demised to the council the freehold dwelling house and premises known as "Trenoweth", Reawla Lane, in the parish of Gwinear-Gwithian in the county of Cornwall for a term of three thousand years by way of mortgage, subject to a proviso for cesser contained in the mortgage, in consideration of the sum of £2,660 then advanced by the council to the defendants. The principal sum and interest were repayable by quarterly instalments. The defendants made default in payment of instalments. On May 31, 1967, so the council alleged, the interest and instalments under the mortgage were in arrear to the extent of £2,742 18s. 11d. That sum was then due and unpaid, the council having by prior notice in writing, dated Apr. 13, 1967, required payment of principal and interest due under the mortgage. The council accordingly claimed possession of the property mortgaged. The net rateable value of "Tronoweth" was alleged by the council to be £61. By order of His Honour JUDGE CHOPE made in Redruth county court on Oct. 26, 1967, it was adjudged that the council should recover from the defendants possession of the mortgaged property and that the defendants should give possession of it on Nov. 23, 1967. By notice dated Oct. 27, 1967, the defendants gave notice of appeal. The principal ground of appeal was that the council's claim was for possession of a freehold valued at more than £3,000, and was accordingly a claim that it was beyond the jurisdiction of the county court to hear and determine.

WILLMER, L.J., stated the nature of the appeal and continued: So far as I have been able to ascertain, there is not, and never has been, any defence on the merits. The point sought to be argued on this appeal is that the judge, in making his order, exceeded the jurisdiction which he had under the County Courts Act, 1959. Two comments may be said to arise on that. One is that the only effect of the defendants succeeding on the appeal would be that a new action would have to be started straight away in the High Court with the resultant expenditure of further costs. The only advantage that the defendants would obtain would be some extension of time. The other comment is this. In the court below the defendants appeared in person, but in this court they have had the advantage of being represented by counsel. From what we are told, it is clear that the point now sought to be argued on the appeal was not taken in argument in the court below, although it is no doubt adumbrated in the defence filed on behalf of the defendants. If that be right, it would follow that strictly speaking that we in this court never had any jurisdiction to entertain the appeal at all. In all the circumstances of the case, however, we have thought it right to entertain the appeal, and we have heard argument on it from both sides. The point is an extremely short one, and it is one that is already covered by authority in a case in the Queen's Bench Divisional Court; and I think that the appeal is avowedly brought for the purpose of testing the correctness or otherwise of that decision of the Divisional Court.

The defendants say that this action is within the words "proceedings for foreclosure or redemption of any mortgage or for enforcing any charge or lien" in s. 52 (1) (c) of the County Courts Act, 1959. That provides that county court jurisdiction in such a case shall be available only where the charge or lien does not exceed £500. Here, without going into precise figures, it is sufficient to say that the amount due on the mortgage is very considerably in excess of £500.

The plaintiff council, on the other hand, say that the action falls within s. 48 (1) of the Act (1), as being an action "for the recovery of land where the net annual value for rating of the land in question does not exceed £400". Here the net annual value for rating purposes does not exceed £400, and therefore, if s. 48 (1) applies, there was jurisdiction. If, on the other hand, jurisdiction is limited to that provided by s. 52 (1) (c) then this action does not fall within the jurisdiction.

The case to which I have referred is that of R. v. Judge Dutton Briant, Ex p. Abbey National Building Society (2). That was a case in which this precise question arose for decision before the Queen's Bench Divisional Court consisting of LORD GODDARD, C.J., BYRNE and DEVLIN, JJ. The Divisional Court went thoroughly into the matter, and a detailed judgment was delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J., with which the other two members of the court agreed. The effect of the decision was to establish that an action such as this is an action for the recovery of land, and therefore comes within s. 48 (1), so that the limit imposed by s. 52 (1) (c) does not apply. That decision has stood, as was pointed out during the argument, for some ten years. Moreover, it is not unimportant to observe (as was pointed

(1) I.e., County Courts Act, 1959, s. 48 (1) as amended by the County Courts (Jurisdiction) Act 1963 (c. 5) s. 1 (1).

A out by counsel for the council) that since the date of that decision the new County Courts Act, 1959, has been passed, re-enacting the relevant provisions of the previous Act. Accordingly, in accordance with the usual rule, it must be assumed that Parliament, when it re-enacted these provisions, had the decision in the case of R. v. Judge Dutton Briant (3) in mind.

B We are now invited to say that the Divisional Court in that case came to a wrong decision. For my part I feel wholly unable to take that course. We have had the judgment in that case read to us more or less in full, and I find myself in agreement with it. It seems to me that, whatever may have been the motive for bringing these proceedings, they were in essence proceedings for the recovery of land, and therefore covered by s. 48 (1). I can see no reason why in 1968 we should say that the Divisional Court in that case was wrong. For my part, I
C would follow the decision in that case, and it necessarily follows from that that this appeal must be dismissed.

DAVIES, L.J.: I agree. As my lord has said, this appeal is totally without merits, and for myself I doubt whether this particular point was pleaded in para. 4 of the defence delivered in person by the defendants. Since the point goes to the
D jurisdiction of the court, however, it may not matter perhaps whether it was pleaded or not. It is to be observed that this mortgage was a legal mortgage by demise for a term of three thousand years. Thus in a sense the plaintiffs, the rural district council, were lessees of the defendants, and the action for possession was in a sense an action by a lessee who was entitled to the legal estate for the ejection of a trespassing lessor. One is, of course, attracted by the argument of counsel
E for the defendants that, although on its face this is a claim for possession of land, it is in a sense a preliminary step to the enforcement by some means or another of the charge that the council had over this property. But in that connexion I think that it is to be noted that in C.C.R., Ord. 24, r. 4 (2), which refers to the form in which the judgment in this case was framed, one finds these words:

F "In an action (other than a foreclosure action) in which there is a claim for possession of any property forming a security for payment to the plaintiff of any principal money or interest, with or without a claim for the whole or part of such money or interest, a judgment for the plaintiff shall include an order to the plaintiff as set out in form 385 . . ."

G that is the formal document here giving the defendants the right to pay the money and so on. It would appear that that rule, dealing with this sort of proceedings, draws a distinction between a foreclosure action and a claim for possession of property forming the security for the payment to the mortgagee. It may be that there is not a great deal in that, but it does indicate, I think, that a distinction is drawn, and that a claim for possession is a claim for possession, whatever its ultimate object.

H We were referred in the course of the argument to a passage in MEGARRY AND WADE ON THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY (2nd Edn.) at p. 868, where this is stated:

I "Since a legal mortgage gives the mortgagee a legal estate in possession, he is entitled to take possession of the mortgaged property as soon as the mortgage is made, even if the mortgagor is guilty of no default; a legal chargee has a corresponding statutory right."

Of course, the learned authors of that work were not thinking of this particular point at the time, and neither, it is to be supposed, was RUSSELL, J., in giving judgment in the case of Birmingham Citizens Permanent Building Society v. Caunt (4). There RUSSELL, J., cited with approval passages from COOTE ON MORTGAGES (5)

(3) [1957] 2 All E.R. 625; [1957] 2 Q.B. 497.

(4) [1962] 1 All E.R. 163; [1962] Ch. 883.

(5) I.e., COOTE ON MORTGAGES (9th Edn.), Vol. 2, at pp. 821, 822.

and MAITLAND'S LECTURES ON EQUITY (6) which make it plain that the legal mortgagee is entitled to possession of the property; and RUSSELL, J., cited (7) a judgment of HARMAN, J. (8) in which the latter judge said, dealing with the procedure which is used in the Chancery Division by originating summons:

"This is a form of procedure now much in vogue when there are persons other than the mortgagor in occupation. It is usually designed to enable the mortgagees to exercise their power of sale, which can only be done with advantage if vacant possession can be offered. It has nothing to do with the enforcement of the mortgage debt, nor with foreclosure. Possession is a remedy to which a mortgagee is entitled as of right against the mortgagor, whether the principal or interest be due or not, unless there is some special clause in the mortgage excluding it."

It seems to me clear from those passages that a distinct line must be drawn between an action for possession of the mortgaged property and the other remedies, foreclosure and so on, which are open to the mortgagee, and would plainly fall under the provisions of s. 52 (1) (c) of the County Courts Act, 1959, as opposed to this case, which in my judgment is clearly within s. 48.

I agree, therefore, that the appeal fails.

EDMUND DAVIES, L.J.: Were the point raised in this appeal res integra, I think that it is a matter of conjecture how it would be determined. Speaking entirely for myself, I do not, with respect, find guidance to its proper determination in the passage quoted already by my lord from p. 868 of MEGARRY AND WADE ON THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY (2nd Edn.). But the combined weight of the Divisional Court judgment in R. v. Judge Dutton Briant (9), the observations of HARMAN, J., in Alliance Perpetual Building Society v. Belrum Investments, Ltd. (10), cited with approval by RUSSELL, J., in Caunt's case (11), and the clear view expressed by my brethren in this court serve to persuade me that such doubts as I confess remain in my mind regarding the proper interpretation of s. 52 (1) (c) of the County Courts Act, 1959, are probably ill-founded.

In these circumstances I do not dissent from the view of my brethren that this appeal should be dismissed.

An indictment was preferred against the appellant containing eleven counts, of which one charged breaking and entering and stealing eight paintings and another charged receiving three of the eight paintings. He pleaded guilty to the count of receiving, it being amended so as to allege receiving all the eight pictures. There was, so the Court of Appeal found, evidence on the depositions to support a charge of receiving the eight pictures. The appellant appealed against conviction. On a preliminary question whether there had been power to make the amendment,

Held: (i) the amendment of the count of receiving so as to include the charge of receiving eight pictures, was validly made under s. 5 (1)* of the Indictments Act, 1915, since an indictment was defective for the purposes of s. 5 (1) if it did not charge an offence which was disclosed by the depositions, just as it was defective if it charged an offence not so disclosed (see p. 1010, letter I, post).

Dictum of LORD PARKER, C.J., in R. v. Martin ([1961] 2 All E.R. at p. 749) considered.

(ii) if the count, as altered to charge receiving the eight pictures, were a new count, the indictment could have been validly amended under s. 5 (1) before arraignment so as to include the new count, there being no injustice to the appellant by so doing (see p. 1011, letter C, post).

Dictum of LORD PARKER, C.J., in R. v. Martin ([1961] 2 All E.R. at pp. 750, 751) applied.

Appeal.

On May 26, 1967, at the Central Criminal Court, the appellant, Michael Hall, pleaded guilty to one count (No. 10) of receiving eight paintings knowing them to have been stolen. He was sentenced by the recorder (SIR CARL AARVOLD) to five years' imprisonment. He now appealed against conviction, despite his plea of guilty, and also against sentence.

The facts of the case are set out in the judgment.

Paul Wrightson, Q.C., and J. B. R. Hazan for the appellant.
J. C. Matthew for the Crown.

LORD PARKER, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court, in which, after stating the circumstances and the reason for hearing the appeal in open court he continued:] This case is commonly called the Dulwich Art Gallery case; as is well known, on Dec. 30/31, 1966, the gallery was broken into and paintings said to be worth £1½ million were stolen. In the result, this appellant was indicted on some eleven counts. Eight of them had nothing to do with the Dulwich Art Gallery robbery and it is quite clear, and indeed is accepted by every one, that if the case had gone to trial on pleas of not guilty counts 1 to 8 would have been severed, and only counts 9, 10 and 11, which dealt with the art gallery case, would have been tried at the same time. The first of those counts alleged that the appellant broke and entered Dulwich Art Gallery and stole these eight paintings; count 10 in the alternative charged that he had received three of them, and count 11 was a count of misprision of felony. In the result he pleaded guilty to count 10 as amended to allege a receiving of all the eight pictures. His case is that he was intimidated in some way to pleading guilty, and I will come back to that in a moment.

In this appeal, counsel for the appellant has taken two preliminary points, the success of either of which he says would at any rate entail a venire de novo. The first point is that there was no power in the court to amend count 10 in the way that I have said. As the court understands his argument, it is that the only power to amend is a power to amend a defective indictment, and that there was nothing defective in count 10 as it originally was, charging a receiving of three pictures; it was not defective in the way of misdescription as to subject matter or date, or the like, and it was, as counsel would readily agree, supported by the evidence at the committal proceedings. He goes on to say that not only was it not defective, but the amendment really amounted to a new count altogether, and that was not permissible even before arraignment. In the course of his argument, the court has been referred to a great number of authorities to which it is unnecessary to refer (1). The argument on the first point, that the count was not defective, is based on the Indictments Act, 1915, s. 5 (1), which provides that:

"Where, before trial, or at any stage of a trial, it appears to the court that the indictment is defective, the court shall make such order for the amendment of the indictment as the court thinks necessary to meet the circumstances of the case, unless, having regard to the merits of the case, the required amendments cannot be made without injustice, and may make such order as to the payment of any costs incurred owing to the necessity for amendment as the court thinks fit."

The latest authority on this matter is R. v. Martin (2). In that case, the circumstances in which a count could be said to be defective were considered, and in giving the judgment of the court, I said this (3):

"An indictment which charges offences which are not disclosed in the depositions and fails to charge an offence which is, lacks the most essential quality of an indictment."

It may well be said that on the facts of that case those remarks were obiter, but this court, faced with deciding the question, has no hesitation in saying that an indictment lacks the most essential quality, in other words is defective, not only if it charges offences which are not disclosed in the depositions, but equally if it fails to charge an offence which is disclosed by the depositions.

In so far as the matter is put by counsel for the appellant on the basis that it is

(1) See footnote †, p. 1009, ante.

(2) [1961] 2 All E.R. 747; [1962] 1 Q.B. 221.

(3) [1961] 2 All E.R. at p. 749; [1962] 1 Q.B. at p. 227.

A a new count, it so happens that that also was dealt with in R. v. Martin (4) where I said:

“We appreciate that no new case has been reported which approves the adding of a new count before arraignment and by way of an amendment, but nevertheless we consider that there is no objection in principle to this being done provided it can be done without injustice.”

B The court then went on to express the hope that the occasions for that would be rare, in that indictments should be carefully drafted. Finally the judgment ended (5):

C “When, however, the court which is asked before arraignment to allow the addition of a new count is satisfied that no injustice will be caused to the defendant, we can see no reason why such an amendment of the indictment should not be made.”

I should add that counsel for the appellant quite rightly, on the facts of this case, cannot suggest that the amendment, or the addition of a new count by way of amendment before arraignment, in the present case caused any injustice whatsoever.

D The second point, as the court understands it, is that looking at the evidence at the end of the day, it is not possible to say that the appellant could have been convicted on the amended count. It may be only a matter of words, but this court is quite satisfied that, granted that there is power to amend, the second question is really whether the amendment asked for and granted was supported by evidence given at the committal proceedings. In the opinion of this court, E there was evidence to support the amendment. It is perfectly true that counsel of some experience who drafted the indictment, limited the count to three pictures, and he clearly did that because he was not so happy about the evidence in regard to the other five. Be that as it may, however, counsel who later led him felt there was such evidence, and this court has no doubt about it at all. F It is unnecessary to go through the details here, but there was evidence on the depositions that the three pictures which formed the subject of the original count had been in the appellant's physical possession. As regards the other five, there was evidence that he knew about them, that he had been negotiating concerning them, and particularly that there was, on the wrappings of the five pictures when they were eventually recovered, newspaper on one sheet of which G was a fingerprint of the appellant. I may say that throughout this appeal, and indeed in his very grounds of appeal, he has admitted guilty knowledge in the sense that he knew that all the eight had been stolen. Those are the two preliminary points taken by counsel for the appellant.

The main point, which resulted in leave to appeal being given, was the suggestion that the appellant's mind did not go with his plea, a plea apparently unequivocal, that he was guilty of receiving the eight pictures. His case, and that H raised by those who have taken cudgels up on his behalf, has really been based on the fact that he was intimidated or threatened into pleading guilty to something of which he was completely innocent. The court allowed the appellant himself to be called to give evidence of this matter, and the court thought it right, bearing in mind the allegations that had been made, to call as witnesses Mr. Robin Simpson, who defended the appellant, Mr. Buzzard, who was prosecuting counsel, Mr. Leonard his junior, and Mr. Pearce Butler, who was the I solicitor's managing clerk at the time. [His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and continued:] I am sure that anybody who has heard the evidence in this case, and had understood the workings of the law and our procedure, could not fail to realise that the appellant has no grievance at all, except perhaps that he was the only man caught, and that his counsel performed his duty to the best of his ability. This court has no hesitation in dismissing the appeal against conviction. [Turning to the appellant's appeal against sentence His LORDSHIP said that the appellant was a man of bad character with a string of convictions and that the court was quite satisfied that there was no reason to interfere with the sentence, and, accordingly, that the appeal against sentence would be dismissed.]

Petition.

This was an application by the widow of a man who had died in a road accident to have the name of a company, Harvest Lane Motor Bodies, Ltd., which had been struck off the register of companies, restored to the register under s. 353 (6) of the Companies Act, 1948. The petitioner had issued a writ dated Apr. 26, 1963, claiming damages against the company under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1959, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. The company's name had been struck off the register in June, 1965. I

D. A. Thomas for the petitioner.

The company did not appear and was not represented.

MEGARRY, J.: This is a petition under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 353 (6). The petitioner, who was represented by counsel, is the only person who appeared before me; but although counsel was instructed on behalf of one party only he

A has very fairly put forward the relevant considerations in the case, together with the authorities.

The matter arises in this way. On July 16, 1961, the husband of the petitioner died as the result of a traffic accident. On Apr. 26, 1963, the petitioner issued a writ against the company claiming damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts and under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. In June, 1965, the company's name was struck off the register under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 353 as being, if I may put it briefly, a defunct company. Notwithstanding this event, which was duly advertised in the London Gazette on July 2, 1965, the proceedings against the company have continued; and various interlocutory orders have, I am told, been made since that date, in some cases, at least, reciting the appearance of counsel for the company. The plight of the company has now come to the notice of those engaged in the action, and in these circumstances the petitioner seeks the restoration of the name of the company to the register under the jurisdiction conferred by s. 353. It is a case in which the Treasury Solicitor has no objection to the application and is not represented, and the Solicitor for the Board of Trade has stated that the Registrar of Companies has no objection.

D The problem is this. Under s. 353 (6) the application may be made if the company "or any member or creditor thereof feels aggrieved" by the company having been struck off. The petitioner here is neither the company nor a member of it, and so she must bring herself within the word "creditor". Can the plaintiff in an action against the company for damages arising out of the death fairly be described as a "creditor" of the company?

E Before attempting to answer this question, I must deal with the possible alternative routes of escape for the petitioner. First, the Third Parties (Rights Against Insurers) Act, 1930, s. 1 (1), contains provisions whereby in an action relating to a road accident proceedings may be brought directly by the plaintiff against the insurers; but under s. 1 (1) (b) these provisions are confined to cases where a winding-up order has been made or there has been a resolution for voluntary winding-up. The dissolution of a company resulting from it being struck off the register under s. 353 is plainly not one of these cases. The second possible alternative route of escape is also not available, namely, under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 352. Under sub-s. (1) of that section, where a company has been "dissolved" (a word plainly applicable to the present case), on application being made for the purpose by the liquidator of the company or by "any other person who appears to the court to be interested", the court may make an order declaring the dissolution to be void. The petitioner is clearly a person who "appears to the court to be interested", but the right to apply under the section is subject to a time limit, namely, "any time within two years of the date of the dissolution". Here more than two years has passed since the date of the dissolution of the company. Accordingly, it appears that if the petitioner is to have redress that redress must be sought under s. 353. I am thus brought back to the meaning of the one word "creditor" as it appears in sub-s. (6) of that section.

I Looking at the Act of 1948 as a whole, I must refer to s. 224 (1), to which counsel has very properly drawn my attention. This defines the persons who may make an application to a court for the winding-up of a company. The subsection provides that the application may be made "either by the company or by any creditor or creditors (including any contingent or prospective creditor or creditors)"; and it then continues with certain other words. It is thus possible to point to a marked contrast between the wide-ranging words of s. 224 (1) on the one hand and the naked word "creditor" in s. 353 (6) on the other hand: ergo, expressum facit cessare tacitum.

As a matter of the language of the statute, there is of course force in this argument. On the other hand, there are certain authorities which have some bearing on the matter, and I must refer to these. First, there is the unreported decision of WYNN-PARRY, J., in Re Avondale Hotel Southport, Ltd. (1). This is cited as authority for the proposition that an order under s. 353 has been made on the petition "of a contingent creditor". Taken literally, this summary statement appears to carry counsel for the petitioner a long way to success, if not the whole way. However, through the diligence of counsel and the assistance of the registrar, I have seen the papers in that case. The petition discloses that it was presented by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in respect of certain assessments to income tax amounting in all to a little under £6,000. The debt was thus in respect of fixed and quantified sums assessed on the company, although they were then contingent to the extent of being the subject of an appeal. Here I have before me a wholly unquantified claim for damages arising out of an accident. Accordingly, when the facts in Re Avondale Hotel Southport, Ltd., (1) are examined they do not by themselves necessarily establish the proposition for which counsel contends. A

Counsel also referred me to Re Telegraph Construction Co. (2). That case related to the Companies Act, 1867, s. 13, which gave a right to object to a reduction of capital to "every creditor of the company" who was entitled to any debt or claim which would have been admissible against the company if the winding-up had then commenced. SIR WILLIAM JAMES, V.-C., held that these words included a claim by lessors of the company's premises to future rent under a long lease, despite a power by the company to determine the lease every ten years. In a somewhat striking statement he said (3): D

"I think we must give a liberal construction to the statute, such as is consistent with common justice and common sense; and it appears to me it would not be consistent with common justice or common sense that a person who has entered into a contingent obligation, by which he has bound himself, should be permitted to say that, because the contingency has not yet happened, although it may still happen, he is not bound to give any security in respect of it." E

He added (4):

"These lessors have a contingent claim, they may become creditors; and I think that shareholders (I am not speaking of ordinary creditors) are not entitled to have assets distributed among themselves so as to prejudice the claims of contingent creditors. If a creditor has a claim which is admissible as a contingent claim, that ought to be admitted to the catalogue of claims admissible to proof in the winding-up. Such a proof is not a proof for anything payable in praesenti, but it is admissible as a proof for something which may ripen into a right to present payment. These lessors have a claim which is admissible to proof for a sum which may become payable at some future day, and they are entitled to ask the court to stop a distribution of the assets amongst shareholders until their claim is secured." F
G

I was also referred to the decision of WRIGHT, J., and the Court of Appeal in Re Midland Coal, Coke and Iron Co., Craig's Claim (5). Here again the statutory provisions were quite different; they related to the approval of creditors to schemes of arrangement. WRIGHT, J., referring to the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, said (6): H

". . . I may take it that s. 2 is intended to apply to everybody who can be treated as a creditor of any sort, whether actual or contingent." I

Speaking for the Court of Appeal, LINDLEY, L.J., said (7):

(1) (1951), unreported. See BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACTS (13th Edn.), p. 701, footnote (f).

(2) (1870), L.R. 10 Eq. 384.

(3) (1870), L.R. 10 Eq. at pp. 387, 388.

(4) (1870), L.R. 10 Eq. at pp. 388, 389.

(6) [1895] 1 Ch. at p. 271.

(5) [1895] 1 Ch. 267.

(7) [1895] 1 Ch. at p. 277.

A "... we agree with WRIGHT, J., in thinking that the word 'creditor' is used in the Act of 1870 in the widest sense, and that it includes all persons having any pecuniary claims against the company."

B The words used in s. 2 were simply "creditors" and "any class of such creditors", without any exegetical words. The section is effect provided an extension to the Companies Act, 1862, s. 159, where the word "creditors" was used with a variety of other words increasing its ambit, including the words "persons having or alleging themselves to have any claim, present or future, certain or contingent, ascertained or sounding only in damages against the company, or whereby the company may be rendered liable."

C I may add, too, that s. 224 (1) of the Companies Act, 1948, which I have already mentioned in relation to its contrasting language, may be prayed in aid in the opposite sense: for it demonstrates that the legislature regarded it as not inapposite for the word "creditor" to be made to include merely contingent or prospective creditors.

D Accordingly, I find myself in the position that, although the authorities show something of a tendency to construe the word "creditor" widely, there is no authority squarely in point on the issue that I have to decide here. It therefore seems to me that I must go back to the wording of s. 353 (6) to see if I can detect in it any tendency to require the somewhat protean word "creditor" to be construed widely or narrowly. In my judgment the section contains a sufficient indication that "creditor" ought to be construed widely. It begins with the

E words: "If a company or any member or creditor thereof feels aggrieved by the company having been struck off the register . . ." The subsection is thus concerned with a grievance on the part of some person, whether a company or a member or a creditor. Here we have the case of a petitioner who at the time when the company was struck off had an action in being against the company which was rendered ineffective by the disappearance of the company from the register. Where one is concerned with those who might feel a legitimate grievance

F because a company has been struck off, it seems to me that one should look somewhat generously at the word "creditor" which precedes the phrase "feels aggrieved". Put another way, I doubt very much whether in using the word "creditor" simpliciter the legislature can have been intending thereby to differentiate between those creditors whose debts are fixed and ascertained and

G those whose debts are contingent or prospective, providing redress for the grievances of the former but ignoring the grievances of the latter. In short, I think it would be wrong to construe the word "creditor" narrowly; and in refusing to do so I feel comforted by the approach indicated by so great a master of equity as SIR WILLIAM JAMES, V.-C., in Re Telegraph Construction Co. (8). Accordingly, in my judgment the word "creditor" is wide enough to embrace the petitioner in this case, and as it is plainly just to restore the company's

H name to the register the petition therefore succeeds.

COVELL v. SWEETLAND.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Hinchcliffe, J.), April 3, 4, 1968.]

Husband and Wife—Maintenance agreement—Duration—No express provision for duration or termination—Subsistence of marriage contemplated at time when agreement entered into—Decree absolute of divorce nearly four years later—Re-marriage of wife about four months after that—Thereafter husband paid towards arrears computed to date of wife's re-marriage—No claim to maintenance under agreement for period after re-marriage until more than four years after re-marriage, arrears claimed in respect of period since decree absolute—Whether agreement for maintenance ceased to have effect after decree absolute—Whether wife estopped from asserting claim.

The plaintiff and defendant were married in 1947. In September, 1956, the marriage having finally broken down, the defendant husband left the wife. At that time it was contemplated, as correspondence showed, that the marriage would continue, the husband refusing to admit that he was in desertion. In November, 1956, the parties entered into a maintenance agreement, which was not under seal. They were therein referred to as "the husband" and "the wife". The agreement contained no words limiting its duration or providing for its termination. It provided that "the husband shall pay to the wife" £3 weekly, and that "the wife" should keep "the husband" indemnified in respect of any liability incurred by her. In January, 1960, the plaintiff wife filed a petition for divorce, and the defendant entered appearance asking to be heard on the questions of costs and maintenance. In May, 1960, a decree nisi was made on the grounds of desertion by the defendant. Before the decree was made absolute the plaintiff's solicitors suggested that the maintenance agreement would become void when the decree nisi was made absolute and asked that a new maintenance order should be agreed. No maintenance order was agreed or made, and the decree was made absolute in August, 1960. The defendant then ceased to make payments to the plaintiff for her own maintenance. In December, 1960, the plaintiff re-married. As a result of correspondence in May and June, 1961, the defendant undertook to pay £49 10s. arrears of maintenance to the plaintiff (computed up to the date of her re-marriage) by weekly payments of 5s. These payments were continued for some time. Letters passed in 1962 and 1963 between solicitors acting for the parties on the subject of maintenance, but it was not suggested that maintenance for the plaintiff should be paid in respect of any period after her re-marriage. In March, 1965, the plaintiff issued a writ claiming, under the agreement of 1956, £699 arrears of maintenance from September, 1960, to the date of the issue of the writ.

Held: the obligation of the defendant husband under the maintenance agreement to pay maintenance to the plaintiff wife ceased to have effect, on the true construction of the agreement (which did not provide expressly for its duration) in August, 1960, when the decree absolute was made; accordingly the plaintiff's claim failed (see p. 1020, letter D, post).

Per CURLIAM: having regard to the correspondence, from which it appeared that the plaintiff allowed the defendant to believe for a number of years that maintenance was not due to her for periods after her re-marriage, the plaintiff would be estopped from maintaining her claim to maintenance for any period after her re-marriage, if the agreement had not ceased by then to have effect (see p. 1020, letters G and H, post).

C Action.

The plaintiff wife and the defendant husband married on Feb. 21, 1947; they had two sons, who were born in 1945 and 1950. The marriage finally broke up in September, 1956, when the husband left the wife. By letter of his solicitors dated Sept. 12, 1956, the husband's willingness to enter into a maintenance agreement for the support of the wife and their two children was communicated to the wife's solicitors, the amount of maintenance offered being £5 weekly. By an agreement under hand made on Nov. 6, 1956, between the husband and the wife it was provided that:

"1. The husband shall pay to the wife the sum of three pounds per week for her own maintenance together with one pound ten shillings in respect of the maintenance of each of their children Adrian Edward and Eric Thomas Hunter the said amount to be paid on Saturday in each week.

"2. The payments in respect of the children shall be made until such time as they attain the age of sixteen years or cease full-time education whichever shall be the later event respectively.

"3. The wife shall have the legal custody of the said children reasonable access to them being given to the husband.

"4. For the consideration aforesaid the wife shall keep the husband indemnified and free in respect of any liability incurred by her."

The wife filed a petition for dissolution of marriage on Jan. 26, 1960, alleging desertion, praying for a decree nisi, custody of the children and maintenance for herself and the children. The husband entered an appearance asking to be heard on the question of costs and maintenance for the children and the wife. A decree nisi was granted on May 19, 1960, with costs and custody of the children. On July 8 the wife's solicitors suggested in correspondence with the husband's solicitors that the maintenance agreement would become void as at the date of the decree absolute, and that a new maintenance order should be agreed or that one should be got ready for the continuance of maintenance. The wife's solicitors wrote again on Aug. 12:

"We shall be glad to learn whether a maintenance order can be agreed otherwise we see no alternative but to ask for an affidavit by your client together with the usual exhibits:"

The decree was made absolute on Aug. 22, 1960. On Oct. 12, 1960, the plaintiff's (the former wife's) solicitors wrote to the husband's solicitors to draw attention to the wife's financial difficulties caused by his non-payment. In this letter her solicitor explained that on the day of the decree absolute the defendant (the former husband) ceased all money payments to the plaintiff. On Dec. 2, 1960, the plaintiff married a Mr. Covell, and on Apr. 27, 1961, she made application to vary the order for custody. In an affidavit in support, she stated that payment was being made voluntarily for each child at the rate of £1 10s. per week. The order for custody was varied. The plaintiff was given custody of the younger child. The older child was then in the R.A.F. In May, 1961, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to ask for the maintenance for the one child to be increased to £2 10s.

per week and also enquired about maintenance for the plaintiff from the decree absolute to the date of re-marriage. The defendant's solicitors replied setting out calculations of the arrears owing in respect of the children and £49 10s. due to the wife up to the date of her re-marriage. The defendant offered to pay off this latter amount at the rate of 5s. per week; this was paid and accepted by the plaintiff for a very considerable time. Although the plaintiff's solicitors disputed the calculation no agreement was reached and the defendant continued to pay £1 10s. in respect of one child. A

New solicitors for the plaintiff wrote to the defendant's solicitors in October, 1962, asking for a copy of the agreement of 1956. In reply they were told that the question of arrears had been dealt with in June, 1961, the defendant had agreed to pay off the arrears at the rate of 5s. per week, and had maintained the payments regularly and would continue to do so in addition to maintaining weekly payments in respect of the one child. In this letter the defendant's solicitors wrote: C

"We could understand the position if, in fact, further arrears had accrued, but this is not the position."

On Nov. 30, 1962, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote that she would take proceedings unless the arrears were paid. The defendant's solicitors replied to the effect that the defendant's total assets were £18 and that he was unable to increase the payments of arrears from 5s. per week and that this amount had been agreed with the plaintiff's previous solicitors. In 1963 a letter written on behalf of the defendant stated that he refused to maintain the plaintiff any longer; and the plaintiff threatened to take out a summons for maintenance. In August, 1963, the defendant re-married. In September he sent the wife 5s. off the arrears of maintenance but withheld any payment in respect of the younger son since access to him had been refused and his whereabouts was not being disclosed. D

On Mar. 22, 1965, the wife issued a writ claiming £699 arrears of maintenance from September, 1960, to the date of the writ. F

HINCHCLIFFE, J., summarised the history of the matter and reviewed the correspondence to which his attention had been drawn and continued:] It is submitted by counsel for the plaintiff that the agreement of 1956 is an agreement for life, and that neither the decree absolute nor the plaintiff's re-marriage can alter the position having regard to the terms of that agreement. It is contended that the agreement is one for life since no words are used to indicate the contrary, and that if it was not intended to be an agreement for life there would have been some such words as "until re-marriage", or words to this effect. It is further pointed out by counsel for the plaintiff that if the terms of an agreement of this sort need to be varied, an application could and should be made to the courts to vary it. G

In support of his argument, counsel for the plaintiff referred the court to Charlesworth v. Holt (1). The headnote of that case reads as follows:

"By a separation deed reciting that differences existed between the defendant and his wife, and that they had agreed to separate, the defendant covenanted with trustees to pay them an annuity for his wife's support 'during their joint lives and so long as they should live separate and apart'. The deed contained clauses which indicated that the parties to the deed contemplated that the marriage relation would continue to exist between the defendant and his wife. In an action by the trustees for arrears of the annuity: Held, that a plea setting forth the deed and alleging the wife's subsequent adultery, and the dissolution of the marriage in consequence, I

A was bad, there being no express words limiting the defendant's obligation to the period during which the marriage tie subsisted."

At first sight it would seem as though this case supported the submission of counsel for the plaintiff that this should be regarded as an agreement for life, but of course it is to be observed that the document in Charlesworth v. Holt (2) was a deed and not a maintenance agreement and—I take the view that this is
B very important—there was a covenant to pay the annuity during their joint lives and so long as they should live separate and apart. There is no such clause in the agreement which the court is considering.

Clifford v. Clifford (3) is also referred to by counsel for the plaintiff. I do not find that that case gives the court much assistance because nowhere in the report is the document set out, and it seems to me that it is an impossible task
C to attempt to construe a document without knowing its precise wording. The other case on this particular subject referred to by counsel for the plaintiff was May v. May (4). I take the view that this case can be distinguished from the present one in that in May v. May (4) there were clear and unequivocal words relating to "the life of the wife".

It is further submitted on behalf of the plaintiff that, although there is no
D legal authority on the point, the plaintiff's re-marriage does not affect the agreement to pay maintenance; the re-marriage, it is said, might perhaps be a ground for the court to vary the maintenance, but there is no automatic discharge of that agreement on re-marriage. Counsel for the plaintiff finally submitted that the question of estoppel which is pleaded in the amended defence does not arise since there was no representation of fact; such representation that may have
E been made related to law which does not create an estoppel.

Counsel for the defendant submits that the agreement in question did not subsist after the decree absolute or re-marriage; and he says that if he is wrong and it did, then it is submitted that the plaintiff is estopped from relying on her strict legal rights under the agreement, having regard to the correspondence and to the circumstances of the case. It is submitted that when the agreement
F is looked at it is plain that it was not one which subsisted after re-marriage, and that when the surrounding circumstances are taken into account it becomes even clearer that the agreement was valid only for so long as the marriage subsisted.

I was invited by counsel for the defendant carefully to consider the terms of that agreement, and it was submitted that when one looks at the preamble of the agreement, it will be seen that the defendant, Eric Edward Sweetland, is referred to as "the husband" and the plaintiff, Ellen Elizabeth Sweetland, is referred to as "the wife". It is submitted that this clearly indicates that the parties or their respective solicitors were at pains to describe the parties of this action throughout as husband and wife. It is said that if this had been an agreement to subsist during their joint lives, they would have been referred to as Mr. Sweetland
H and Mrs. Sweetland.

The next point that I am asked to take into consideration arises on the words "The husband shall pay to the wife". It is submitted that on those words it is as plain as a pikestaff that the agreement is one which remains in force so long as Ellen Elizabeth Sweetland remains the wife of the defendant. I was then asked to have regard to cl. 4 of the agreement, which is to the effect that the wife
I shall keep the husband indemnified and free in respect of any liability incurred by her, and it is submitted that that would be powerless if the marriage were to be dissolved because it could have no application. Finally, it is submitted that on this agreement it is plain that the parties to it contemplated that the marriage would continue, and it was only an agreement to support the wife so long as she remained a wife. Those are the points that I take into consideration when I consider the agreement on its face value.

(3) (1884), 9 P.D. 76.

(4) [1929] All E.R. Rep. 484; [1929] 2 K.B. 386.

Counsel asks the court to consider the surrounding circumstances which he says are to be found in the correspondence. He draws attention to the letter of Sept. 12, 1956, which intimates that the defendant is prepared to enter into a maintenance agreement. There was no ground apparently for ending the marriage at that time. It is said that the defendant obviously contemplated that the marriage would continue and only qua the married life was he prepared to enter into the maintenance agreement. The letter of Sept. 25, 1956, reasserts that the wife had no ground for dissolving the marriage and again it is submitted that looking at that letter it is plain that the way in which the defendant was approaching his position was that so long as the marriage continued he would look after the wife and the children. The letter of Oct. 4, 1956, is the letter in which it is made plain that the defendant was prepared to enter into a maintenance agreement with his wife. On Oct. 22, 1956, the defendant, in a letter, refused to admit that he was in desertion; and so it is submitted that having regard to the terms of the agreement and to the surrounding circumstances it is quite plain that this agreement was only to be regarded as in force so long as the plaintiff remained the defendant's wife.

In my judgment, everything seems to me to point to the agreement being one to provide for the plaintiff as a wife so long as the marriage lasted; the words of the agreement and the surrounding circumstances make this abundantly clear. This marriage ended by the decree being made absolute on Aug. 22, 1960, and that is when the agreement in question ceased to have any effect. In these circumstances, it follows that this claim cannot succeed and the question of estoppel does not arise. Out of respect for the careful arguments addressed to the court by both learned counsel I would say this, that all the cases which have been cited, including the New Zealand one of P. v. P. (5), which seems to me to have been rightly decided, show that a representation can constitute an estoppel, but it must be one of fact—in this case, I think, the representation was of mixed law and fact—it must have been made with the intention that it would be acted on and it must have been acted on to the detriment of the person to whom it was made. Certainly in this case the defendant has been prejudiced in that he took no steps to vary the agreement—no steps to protect himself—and he failed to put any money aside to pay the maintenance. Therefore, it seems to me that if the plaintiff by her solicitors' letters allowed the defendant to believe for a number of years that the true position as to maintenance was as represented, and the defendant did so believe and acted to his detriment, then the plaintiff is estopped from denying that the facts were as represented.

In my judgment the plaintiff is estopped, having regard to all the circumstances of the case; that is to say that the agreement was intended to be for the duration of the marriage, and it only came to an end by the decree absolute. The plaintiff in the letters written on her behalf never suggested that the maintenance should be paid after she re-married and the first suggestion of this was Mar. 22, 1965, when this writ was issued. I have no doubt at all that it would be grossly unfair to the defendant if he should be ordered to satisfy the plaintiff's claim after so many years of delay during which he was lulled into a sense of false security into believing that the maintenance for the plaintiff certainly ended after she had re-married on Dec. 21, 1960 and no claim for continuing the maintenance was ever made until the issue of the writ. Therefore, in my judgment, the plaintiff is estopped from asserting that the defendant is indebted to her in the agreement in respect of maintenance. There will be judgment for the defendant.

R. v. LYCETT.

B

Criminal Law—Sentence—Appropriate sentence for existing offences to be imposed—Concurrent instead of consecutive terms of imprisonment imposed with a view to qualifying offender for an extended term under Criminal Justice Act 1967 (c. 80) s. 37, if offence committed in future—Wrong in principle.

When sentencing a prisoner for offences on which the court is adjudicating, the court should not reach its decision with a view to enabling another court at a later date to impose, for some future offence not yet committed, an extended term of imprisonment under the power conferred by s. 37 (2)* of the Criminal Justice Act 1967; but the sentence passed should be determined by what is appropriate to the offences before the court at the time of sentencing. Thus it is wrong to impose for, e.g., three offences for which the appropriate sentences would each be one years' imprisonment consecutive, three concurrent terms of imprisonment each of three years, merely because the consequence of imposing an aggregate term of imprisonment of three years in the latter form would be to qualify the prisoner for an extended sentence under s. 37 (2), if he should be convicted in future of an offence not yet committed; though, if a sentence of three years is proper for each of the three existing offences, the Court of Appeal will not interfere with concurrent terms of three years so imposed (see p. 1022, letters F and G, post).

(2) of this section are: (a) the offence was committed before the expiration of three years from a previous conviction of an offence punishable on indictment with imprisonment for a term of two years or more . . . and (b) the offender has been convicted on indictment on at least three previous occasions since he attained the age of twenty-one of offences punishable on indictment with imprisonment for a term of two years or more; and (c) the total length of sentences of imprisonment . . . to which he was sentenced on those occasions was not less than five years . . ."

and stealing other articles. The fourteen other offences taken into consideration consisted again of the same pattern; four of them were housebreakings and larcenies, seven were obtaining goods by fraudulent use of cheques from a cheque book that he had stolen, two were for fraudulently selling stolen goods which he had said were his to sell, and there was one offence of larceny. A

The truth of the matter is that the appellant was becoming a confounded nuisance in Brighton. These offences, committed within a week of his being released from prison on the last occasion, followed a history of ten previous convictions starting when he was sixteen involving larcenies, housebreakings and larcenies and false pretences, in the course of which probation has been tried three times, he has been sent to borstal, he has been returned to borstal, and he has had up to eighteen months' imprisonment. In those circumstances a comparatively heavy sentence was called for. B

Counsel for the appellant has quite properly drawn attention to the fact that the recent bout of offences may be due to the breakdown of the appellant's marriage, and says that he has now found a young girl who he wishes to marry when he can, though that will not be for some considerable time because divorce proceedings have not been commenced, and accordingly he asks in those circumstances for a reduction in the sentence. This court can see no ground whatever for reducing the sentence in this case; it seems to them that a total of three years was a perfectly proper sentence. C

Having said that, the court would like to draw attention to what the recorder said when he sentenced the appellant, for this was the ground which actuated the single judge in granting leave. The recorder said D

"If you had qualified I would have to consider giving you an extended term of imprisonment to protect the public (1), and I will tell you exactly why on this occasion I am not imposing for each of these three offences a sentence of one year consecutive but of three years, all to be concurrent, because that would qualify as one of the reasons why a court in future could pass a longer sentence on you." E

The court would like to draw attention to that, because it seems to the court wholly wrong in principle that the nature of the sentence given today should be determined by the manner in which the court would like to deal with the prisoner if he went on and committed some offence in the future. He must be sentenced for the current offence in the appropriate way, regardless of what effect that may have on any sentence which might have to be meted out to him in the future. This court has already said, however, that the sentence of three years on each count concurrent was a perfectly proper sentence, and there is no ground for interfering with it. F

Appeal.

This was an appeal by the Official Solicitor as guardian ad litem of an infant child from an order of Mr. Commissioner JUDGE SIR OWEN TEMPLE-MORRIS, Q.C., dated Mar. 22, 1968, ordering in a paternity issue that a blood test of the child be taken. The facts are set out in the judgment of LORD DENNING, M.R.

J. P. Comyn, Q.C., and D. B. Williams for the Official Solicitor as guardian ad litem for the child.

Joseph Jackson, Q.C., and M. C. Nicholson for the husband.
T. Watkins, Q.C., and Michael Evans for the wife.

LORD DENNING, M.R.: In Re L. (1), this court held that, in proceedings relating to the custody of a child, any judge of the High Court can order a test to be taken of the child's blood. The question now arises whether a judge can order a blood test on a paternity issue, or indeed on any other issue. We are told that many cases are waiting the determination of this one.

The facts are these. Mr. Barnes, the husband, brought a petition for divorce against the wife alleging that she had been guilty of adultery with the co-respondent. In his petition, he said that there were no children of the family, that is, of himself and the wife; but he said that the wife had committed adultery with the co-respondent in about October, 1963, as a result of which she gave birth to a son on Aug. 22, 1964. It was an undefended case. When the husband gave evidence before the commissioner, JUDGE GEOFFREY HOWARD, he was asked when he last lived with his wife. He said: "I saw her for one night approximately on Nov. 17, 1963"; and that he had sexual intercourse with her on that night. If that statement was correct, it would mean that he was possibly the father of the child. He himself did not think that he was the father. Nor did the wife. When the child was born, the wife and the co-respondent registered the co-respondent as the father. Nevertheless, when it appeared that the husband had had intercourse with the wife about the time that the child was conceived, the commissioner thought that he ought to get to the bottom of it. It was the commissioner's duty under s. 33 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965 to be satisfied "as respects every relevant child" that proper arrangements had been made for his care and upbringing. The commissioner could not determine whether this child was "a relevant child", that is, a child of both parties to the marriage, unless the paternity was settled. So the commissioner directed that an issue should be tried as to whether the boy was a child of the family. He ordered that the child was to be made a party to the issue through a guardian ad litem. The Official Solicitor was appointed guardian ad litem. The paternity issue came before the commissioner, JUDGE SIR OWEN TEMPLE-MORRIS, Q.C., on Mar. 22, 1968. The question arose whether the child should have a blood test. All three of the adults, the husband, the wife and the co-respondent, have had a blood test. It has been taken by an expert, Dr. Alan Grant of Guy's Hospital. As a result, Dr. Grant says that, if a blood test is taken of the child, he can say with certainty which of the two men is the father of the child. He will be able to say whether it was the husband, or the co-respondent. The commissioner, in the circumstances, thought that it was in the best interests of the child to have a blood test. The Official Solicitor objected. He said that the commissioner had no power to order it on a paternity issue. The commissioner overruled the objection. He ordered a blood test to be taken. The Official Solicitor appeals to this court. He is anxious for the court to lay down a rule, so that he shall know where he stands.

There is a difference of opinion among the judges of the Divorce Division on this point. WRANGHAM, J., in L. v. L. (2), declined to order a blood test. He said that he had no power to order a blood test on a paternity issue. LANE, J., in Hardcastle v. Hardcastle (3), ordered a blood test, even in an adultery issue. She thought that it was in the best interests of the child so to do. In view of this difference of opinion, it is clearly desirable for this court to lay down a definite rule. It is unnecessary to review the matter at length. That was done in Re L. (1). Suffice it to say that, after full discussion, we see no reason for confining the jurisdiction, as WILLMER, L.J., did (4), to the court's custodial jurisdiction. The

A jurisdiction is unlimited in a judge of the High Court. He can order a blood test to be taken whenever it is in the best interests of the child. I repeat what I said in that case (5):

B “So also in a paternity issue, or any proceedings where it is in the best interests of the child to have its paternity settled one way or the other, the court can order a blood test. Even in a petition for divorce on the ground of adultery, the judge can in my view order a blood test on the child, for there too the child is vitally affected by the outcome.”

C That being so, I hold that JUDGE SIR OWEN TEMPLE-MORRIS, Q.C., was entitled to make the order that he did. It is clearly in the child's interest to have a blood test, since it will settle definitely one way or the other which of the men is the father. As it happens, we are told that the child has already had the blood test. It only awaits the order of this court for it to be made known to the parties. So now all is straightforward.

D A question was asked as to the extent to which the child should be consulted. If the child is of tender years—say under seven years, and thus unable to give consent, one way or the other—then the High Court judge can order a blood test without consulting the child. If the child is older, say fourteen or fifteen years of age, then the views of the child should be taken into consideration; but the child's views are never decisive. Even if the child is difficult, the court can order a blood test if it is clearly in the interests of the child, just as it can order an operation in the case of a ward of court.

E I would stress, however, that the jurisdiction to order a blood test is vested only in the High Court, and not in the county court. There is a new Act, the Matrimonial Causes Act 1967, which gives jurisdiction to the county courts to try undefended divorce cases. So far as I can see at present, the only jurisdiction which is vested in the county court judges under the Act of 1967 is the statutory jurisdiction in divorce. There is not vested in them the parental jurisdiction of a judge of the High Court. That is derived from the Crown as parens patriae and not from any statute. No doubt in some of the undefended cases which come before F the county court under the Act of 1967, it may be desirable in the interests of the child to have a blood test. If so, the procedure is simple. The county court judge will refer it to a High Court judge as a matter suitable for ancillary relief; and the High Court judge can order the blood test. Likewise, of course, a magistrates' court has no power to order a blood test against the will of the parties. The G magistrate can only do it by consent of those concerned, namely, the grown-ups and the mother on behalf of the child; but, nevertheless, if any of them does not consent, the magistrate can take that refusal into account. I adhere to the view which I expressed in Re L. that (6):

H “If an adult unreasonably refuses to have a blood test, or to allow a child to have one, I think that it is open to the court in any civil proceedings (no matter whether it be a paternity issue or an affiliation summons, or a custody proceeding) to take his refusal as evidence against him, and may draw an inference therefrom adverse to him. This is simply common sense.”

I The conclusion of the whole matter is that a judge of the High Court has power to order a blood test whenever it is in the best interests of the child. The judges can be trusted to exercise this discretion wisely. I would set no limit, condition or bounds to the way in which judges exercise their discretion. The object of the court always is to find out the truth. When scientific advances give us fresh means of ascertaining it, we should not hesitate to use those means whenever the occasion requires. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

DIPLOCK, L.J.: I too would dismiss this appeal. Probably because of my unfamiliarity with the procedure in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division,

(6) [1968] 1 All E.R. at p. 26; [1968] P. at p. 159.

I think that it is a simple question; but so I do. We are concerned here with the jurisdiction of the High Court—I emphasise that—of the High Court, not of any particular division of the High Court. In W. v. W. (No. 4) (7), decided in 1964, it was decided that the High Court has no jurisdiction to order an adult to submit to a blood test, because that would be an assault on the unconsenting adult; but adults can, of course, consent to submit to a blood test. A parent or guardian who has control of a child, can arrange for the child to have a blood test; and the evidence of a blood test so obtained, which today is highly cogent evidence as to paternity—or may be so—is admissible on any issue in which the parentage of a child is relevant. In Re L. (8), the question arose for the first time whether the courts could order a child to be submitted to a blood test where the child was a party to the proceedings and represented by the guardian ad litem. The Court of Appeal there held that the High Court had such a power, but that such power was not derived from the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965, but from the jurisdiction conferred on the High Court by s. 18 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which provides by sub-ss. (2) and (3):

“(2) There shall be vested in the High Court: (a) Subject as otherwise provided in this Act, the jurisdiction which was formerly vested in, or capable of being exercised by, all or any of the courts following:—(i) The High Court of Chancery, both as a common law court and as a court of equity . . .

“(3) The jurisdiction vested in the High Court shall, subject as otherwise provided in this Act, include the jurisdiction which was formerly vested in, or capable of being exercised by, all or any one or more of the judges of the courts aforesaid respectively sitting in court or chambers or elsewhere, when acting as judge or a judge, in pursuance of any statute, law or custom, and all powers given to any such court or to any such judges or judge by any statute, and also all ministerial powers, duties and authorities incident to any and every part of the jurisdictions so vested.”

The court's jurisdiction, accordingly, to order a child to be blood tested, which was in effect the jurisdiction by consent of the child to his or her blood being tested is thus part of the ancient paternal jurisdiction of the court.

In Re L. (8) the matter came before the court in proceedings under s. 34 of the Act of 1965 as to the custody of the child, and a controversy arose between the members of that court by way of obiter dicta whether the jurisdiction was confined to cases where the custody of the child was in issue. LORD DENNING, M.R., in the passage which he has already read, took the view that the jurisdiction was not so confined; but WILLMER, L.J., in a passage at the end of his judgment (9), said this:

“Having regard to what has been said by [LORD DENNING, M.R.], I think it right to add two further observations. First, I confine my judgment with regard to the court's power to order a test of a child's blood to cases arising, as this case does, within the court's custodial jurisdiction. I am not, as at present advised, prepared to hold that such a power exists in a paternity issue, and still less on a petition for divorce on the ground of adultery. So to hold would in my judgment be contrary to the decision of this court in W. v. W. (7).”

I need not deal with his next observation. DAVIES, L.J., said (10) that he concurred with the two reservations made by WILLMER, L.J., with the judgment of LORD DENNING, M.R.

In this case, we have to make our choice between the conflicting views expressed obiter by LORD DENNING, M.R., on the one hand, and WILLMER, L.J., (7) [1963] 2 All E.R. 841; [1964] P. 57.

(8) [1968] 1 All E.R. 20; [1968] P. 119.

(9) [1968] 1 All E.R. at p. 34; [1968] P. at p. 171.

(10) [1968] 1 All E.R. at p. 34; [1968] P. at p. 172.

A and DAVIES, L.J., on the other. Having heard full argument on the case, I am satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt (to use the expression used in rebutting the presumption as to legitimacy) that LORD DENNING, M.R., was right in saying that such an order may be made in any case where the child is made a party to the proceedings and in the opinion of the judge of the High Court it is in the child's best interests that it should be made. Where such a blood test is made, B whether, as in the present case, on an issue as to paternity, or whether where the judge thinks it is in the interests of the child on an issue as to adultery in a suit for dissolution of marriage, the evidence of that blood test is, in my view, clearly admissible in any proceedings in which the parentage of the child is relevant. I also agree with LORD DENNING, M.R., that this jurisdiction, being one conferred on the High Court alone by s. 18 of the Supreme Court of Judicature C (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and not by Part 3 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965, relating to the protection of children, the jurisdiction to order such a test on behalf of a child is not transferred to a divorce county court under s. 2 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1967, for that provides that

“ . . . a divorce court county court shall have jurisdiction to exercise any power exercisable under Part 2 or Part 3 of the Matrimonial Causes Act D 1965 in connection with any petition, decree or order pending in or made by such a court and to exercise any power under s. 22 or s. 24 of that Act.”

It does not purport to confer on a divorce county court the parental jurisdiction acquired by the High Court under s. 18 of the Act of 1925.

E I would add in passing that—since I have been speaking about the admissibility of blood tests as evidence—I reserve any views about the evidential inferences to be drawn by the refusal of anyone to take a blood test. As LORD DENNING, M.R., said in Re L. (11), that is a matter of common sense, and I would prefer to leave it to common sense. My unfamiliarity with the procedure in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division to which I have already confessed makes it highly F undesirable that I should attempt to lay down any rules how this discretion should be exercised by the judge who exercises it in any particular case. His consideration must be what is in the best interests of the child, and I can conceive of cases where it may be in the child's interest to rely on the presumption of legitimacy rather than to put it to the risk. Such cases must, I think, be rare, because on the whole I agree with LORD DENNING, M.R., that in most cases it is in the best interests of everyone, including the child, that truth should out. In G the present case, however, there seems to me to be no doubt, and the learned commissioner had no doubt, that it is in the interests of the child that the blood test should be taken. Whether the test shows that the father is the former husband or that the child is the child of the present husband, who was the co-respondent in the suit, the child will be legitimated either by being the child of the marriage or because he will have been legitimated by the subsequent marriage of his two H parents. He cannot, therefore, in my view, in any way suffer by whatever the result of the blood test is. Here it is plainly a case where it is in the interests of the child that he should know who his father is.

I SACHS, L.J.: I agree that this appeal should be dismissed, but at the outset I emphasise that the Official Solicitor was entirely correct in bringing the matter before this court, for there are involved questions of transcending importance to many children. The sole issue raised in this case by counsel for the Official Solicitor has been as to the extent of the inherent jurisdiction of the court qua parens patriae to consent on behalf of the infant to the taking of a blood test of the child. In the present case, and, indeed, as appears to have been the case in Re L. (12), it is to be noted that the age of the infant is such that no questions of an order in invitum can arise. The sole question posed here today is whether that jurisdiction qua parens patriae is limited to what has been referred to as custodial cases where it will be for the benefit of the infant to use that jurisdiction, or whether the jurisdiction extends to all cases where it would be of benefit to the infant that the test be made. In using the word "benefit", I have in mind the sense in which it is used in the exercise of the court's parens patriae functions, and would mention that, when I refer to benefit of the infant in other places in this judgment, it has to be interpreted in that particular sense.

As regards discretion, if the jurisdiction exists, counsel for the Official Solicitor specifically disclaimed any intention to discuss whether such a test was or was not in the above sense for the benefit of the infant in this particular case. What he did do was very properly to draw the attention of the court to the great range of different cases that could arise if the jurisdiction is unlimited. So great and so diverse is that range, that it includes many cases in which it would be extremely difficult to ascertain what is for the benefit of the infant or to determine whether the test is in truth being asked for the benefit of that infant or for the benefit of others.

On the issue of jurisdiction, once it had been decided by this court in Re L. (13) to exist at all, in a case where it was to the interests of the child, I cannot for my part see any ground for limiting it to any particular class of cases, unless it can in some instance be said that, as to the discretion in that class of case, it could never be for the benefit of a child for that jurisdiction to be exercised. It follows from my view that the sole test when exercising the jurisdiction is whether or not it is for that benefit.

To ascertain and declare the existence of the facet of the High Court's inherent jurisdiction with which we are today concerned may be said to have been relatively easy. It is no less easy to see that it is one of transcending importance on the lives of many infants. What troubles me is the question of the application of this jurisdiction; and that sub-divides itself into questions (i) relating to the procedure for determining whether the consent should be given; and (ii) how the discretion should be exercised. Perhaps I take a more cautious view of these matters owing to experience in the Division exercising divorce jurisdiction, but there seems to me no doubt that the taking of blood tests may produce a real revolution in the approach to many issues that are canvassed there. Moreover, from what has been said today at the Bar, it looks like producing a veritable flood of cases. That caution of mine may, perhaps, be reflected in the views of those two lords justices in Re L. (13) who were so experienced in their day in divorce matters and were not disposed readily to agree that the jurisdiction even existed in relation to determining paternity and adultery issues. Prominent to my mind is the fact that it is essential to remember that the parens patriae jurisdiction is one for the benefit and protection—I emphasise the words "and protection"—of the infant; and that it, it must be emphasised, can be something very different from the self-centred interests that adults may have in sorting out their own affairs. The latter interests may obviously be very different from those of the infant, who may in the course of the proceedings be deprived of the name which he thought he bore, not to mention the fortune which he might have inherited. Moreover, one must not wholly overlook the potential existence of cases where the adults wish so to manoeuvre that the infant comes out of his prima facie position. To bastardise a child may be in the interests of the adults or some other child, but not of the infant bastardised. The same may apply to the break-up of a parental home.

In some ways the position as to this new facet of the jurisdiction in the court, or, perhaps I should say, newly developed facet of its jurisdiction, has a parallel to that which obtained when the courts declared the existence of its important jurisdiction to insist on discretion statements in divorce proceedings. Apted v. Apted and Bliss (14), which discussed the measure of the discretion to be exercised,

A was followed first by practice directions (cf., RAYDEN ON DIVORCE (3rd Edn.) p. 588), and later by rules of court: but it was not until 1943, some thirteen years later, that in Blunt v. Blunt (15) the House of Lords finally laid down the principles on which the discretion should be exercised. In this instance, the Official Solicitor has expressed himself as being most anxious to have some guidance on matters, and manifestly needs it.

B In regard to these blood tests, it seems to me that without guidance great divergencies both of practice and of views on discretion may arise. Rules of practice seem to me to be an early and imperative necessity, and preliminary guidance on discretion would, no doubt, be helpful as soon as it can be obtained. In the absence of any real opportunity to consider what may be the answers to some of the problems which have been raised today in this court, I naturally do not propose to propound rules either of practice or of discretion, but to call attention to matters which have come to the surface in the course of helpful submissions by counsel very experienced in the work of one Division. First of all, as regards practice, the question arises whether the Official Solicitor should act without coming to the court for guidance. I say no more than that I would assume that, until matters have sorted themselves out, he would come to the court if he were in any doubt and would so advise the many solicitors who consult him. The next matter which arises is whether the tests should be ever ordered unless, as in the two cases which have so far been before this court, there is known (by reference to concluded tests on all relevant adults) to be a really substantial chance that the tests would resolve the issue which was troubling the court; I would doubt it. The next is whether there should be precautions against a possibility of abuse, or whether it can be said that the importance to an infant of his parentage and of his fortune are less than the importance of a chance of his being convicted under certain sections of the Road Traffic Acts. Finally, there is a question of practice and procedure, whether a welfare report ought not normally to be obtained in the same way as it was in Re L. (16): I would so hope.

Turning from practice to discretion again, a whole crop of problems became evident on the questions whether a child should be permitted to bastardise itself, and whether and to what extent the court should or should not try to put itself into the position of that child. I regret that neither in Re L. (16) nor in the present case has the court been so composed as to have on it a member who has had experience of the exercise of the Chancery wardship procedure at first instance and has been brought up in the principles there exercised. It is in courts of Chancery that the parens patriae functions were first conceived, and certainly those courts have had the main development of them—at any rate, until relatively recently.

Should the child be allowed or should the child not be allowed to consent to an order which will assist the break-up of the parental home? What happens if the child objects, knowing what is the purpose of the test? How should the court deal with the cases of affiliation and separation orders? All these are matters which need careful consideration. That consideration, I am very glad to say, is, at any rate, at the moment confined to judges of the High Court—a relatively small number of judges specially experienced in such matters. But, of course, one must envisage that there may well be a short Act transferring that consideration to the manifold county courts who deal with other matters ancillary to a divorce. Wherever the consideration lies, however, there is no doubt that the matters to be dealt with are such as to give scope, as was plainly shown arguendo in the present case, for deeply different individual judicial views as to what is and what is not in the interests of the child in relation to potential bastardisation on the given facts of any one case. For instance, is it or is it not held all over the country and in all sections of the community that it is of no or of minimal importance to a child to call it out of its name? The sooner authoritative guidance can be given on that point, to my mind the better. Having said that, and having, I hope, put at any rate into the realm of consideration matters which may arise from a decision which will have such wide effects, I can do no more to help the Official Solicitor.

C. MAURICE & CO. LTD. v. MINISTER OF LABOUR.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Lord Denning, M.R., Diplock and Sachs, L.J.J.), May 21, 1968.]

Selective Employment Tax—Refund—Appeal—Activities of employer qualifying for refund—Standard Industrial Classification, headings 500, 602—Determination of tribunal whether activities were within the scope of particular description in heading 602—Tribunal's decision on such a question not to be interfered with on appeal, if it could reasonably have been reached—Employer's business in laying electric cables—Whether engaged in distribution of electricity for public supply within heading 602—Selective Employment Payments Act 1966 (c. 32) s. 2 (2), (3).

On the question whether the nature of the activities of an undertaking qualify or do not qualify for selective employment tax refund as being within the scope of, or outside, a particular heading of the Standard Industrial Classification, the decision of the tribunal (being in this respect the decision of a tribunal of fact) should not be interfered with on appeal unless it is one to which the tribunal could not reasonably have come (per LORD DENNING, M.R., and SACHS, L.J., DIPLOCK, L.J., dissenting; see p. 1032, letter F, p. 1034, letter D, and p. 1035, letter A, post).

Dictum of LORD WILBERFORCE in Lord Advocate v. Reliant Tool Co. ([1968] 1 All E.R. 162) applied.

The appellants were contractors who worked for an Area Electricity Board; their work included laying electric cables, joining them, and erecting sub-stations. Some area boards did the same work with direct labour. On appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court reversing the decision of an industrial tribunal that the appellants' activities were within heading 602 of the Standard Industrial Classification, as being distribution of electricity,

Held (DIPLOCK, L.J., dissenting): the decision of the tribunal should stand for the reasons stated at letter F, above, and the appellants were entitled, therefore, to refund of selective employment tax (see p. 1033, letter E, and p. 1036, letter H, post).

(ii) the words "distribution of electricity for public supply" in heading 602 extended to the work in the present case, which was work necessary to ensure that electricity would get to consumers (see p. 1032, letter D, and p. 1036, letter A, post).

Appeal allowed.

A Case referred to:

Lord Advocate v. Reliant Tool Co., [1968] 1 All E.R. 162; [1968] 1 W.L.R. 205.

Appeal.

This was an appeal by notice dated Nov. 23, 1967, given by the appellants, C. Maurice & Co., Ltd., from an order of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division (LORD PARKER, C.J., SALMON, L.J., and WIDGERY, J.), dated Oct. 18, 1967, setting aside a decision of the Industrial Tribunal, dated Jan. 16, 1967. The tribunal had decided that the appellants' establishment at Bishops Stortford and Thundersley, Benfleet, were establishments which satisfied the requirements of s. 2 (2) (a), (b) of the Selective Employment Payments Act 1966. The grounds of appeal from the Divisional Court were (i) that the court's judgment was wrong in law in that the court misdirected themselves as to the proper construction of headings 500 and 602 of the Standard Industrial Classification; (ii) that the judgment was wrong in that there was evidence before the tribunal to support its finding that both the appellants' establishments were engaged in activities falling under heading 602; (iii) that the judgment was wrong in law in that on the evidence and on the proper construction of headings 500 and 602 each of the appellants' establishments was engaged in activities falling within heading 602 and that both establishments satisfied the requirements of s. 2 (2) (a) and (b) of the Act of 1966.

F. B. Purchas, Q.C., and J. R. V. McAulay for the appellants, the employers.
P. E. Webster, Q.C., and G. Slyn for the Minister of Labour*.

LORD DENNING, M.R.: The appellants, a company called C. Maurice & Co., Ltd., are engaged in the electricity industry. They are contractors who do work for the area electricity boards. They lay electric cables, joint them up, reinforce the existing electric cables, erect sub-stations, and the like. At Bishops Stortford they have 184 employees, of whom 150 are engaged in laying cables and doing jointing work, etc. At Thundersley they have 243 employees, of whom 202 do such work. The question is whether this activity is a qualifying activity such as to entitle the company to a refund of the selective employment tax.

Several of the area electricity boards do precisely the selfsame work as this company, but they do it by direct labour employed by themselves. Other boards do not have the means to do it themselves and employ this company to do it. The tribunal stated:

"There is no doubt that what the company is doing is what the boards would themselves have to do to ensure the distribution of electricity for public supply."

There's the rub. When an area board does the work by direct labour, it does not have to pay the selective employment tax. Why should the company have to pay it when they do the selfsame work as contractors? If this be right, the public sector is given an unfair advantage over the private sector of industry. Five men may be working in a trench laying cables. If three are employed by an area electricity board, the board do not pay the tax. If two are employed by this company, they have to pay it. Is this fair?

Under the Selective Employment Payments Act 1966 s. 2 (2) and (3), the company is entitled to a refund if it is established that it is engaged by way of business wholly or partly in activities that come under heading 602 of the Standard Industrial Classification. Heading 602 provides: "Electricity. The production and distribution of electricity for public supply." If the activities of the establishments of the company fall within those words, they are entitled to the refund.

* The functions of the Minister of Labour are transferred to the Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity by the Order, S.I. 1968 No. 729.

The Minister of Labour says that their activities do not come under heading 602. He says that they come under heading 500: "Construction", under which the company is not entitled to a refund. Heading 500 provides:

"Construction. Erecting and repairing buildings of all types. Constructing and repairing roads and bridges; erecting steel and reinforced concrete structures; other civil engineering work, such as laying sewers and gas mains, erecting overhead line supports and aerial masts, opencast coal-mining . . ."

The contest is simply whether the activities of this establishment fall under heading 602 or heading 500. The Industrial Tribunal held that the activities of this establishment came under heading 602 and that they were entitled to the refund. The Divisional Court reversed the tribunal. They held that the activities did not come under heading 602, but under heading 500. Now there is an appeal to this court.

I must say at once that I agree with the tribunal. It seems to me that, when men are laying cables and jointing cables, and so forth, they are engaged in the "distribution of electricity for public supply". They are doing the very things which are essential to the distribution. "Distribution" is not confined to switching on the current. It includes all the work necessary to ensure that the electricity will get to the consumers.

I would, however, hesitate to set up my view against so strong a Divisional Court, except for this: there has been recently a decision of the House of Lords in Lord Advocate v. Reliant Tool Co. (1) on appeal from Scotland. It was not on this very point, but it emphasises the weight which should be given to a tribunal's decision. The House of Lords has held quite plainly that many of the matters arising under the Act of 1966 are best left to the tribunal. It has a lawyer as chairman, with two industrialists sitting with him. When there is a line to be drawn between activities which qualify or do not qualify, it is for the tribunal to say on which side of the line any particular activity falls. Their decision should not be interfered with unless it was a decision to which they could not reasonably have come.

The mistake which the Divisional Court have made is that they have analysed the Standard Industrial Classification as if it were a lawyer's document, to be dealt with by lawyers, much as if they were construing a statute for a deed; but the Standard Industrial Classification is not a lawyer's document. It was prepared for use by statisticians, and not by lawyers. When Parliament came to impose the selective employment tax, they seized on this statistician's document and used it for purposes quite different from those for which it was originally intended. We should look at it broadly, remembering that the headings are only guides to a classification. They are illustrative, not exhaustive. Take one point which impressed the Divisional Court. It is about gas mains. Heading 601 provides: "Gas: The production and distribution of gas for public supply". Then heading 500 refers to "civil-engineering work, such as laying sewers and gas mains". Hence the Divisional Court say that the laying of gas mains comes within heading 500. It cannot be included in heading 601: "Distribution of gas for public supply." Thus they held that "distribution" does not include laying gas mains in heading 601. So also in heading 602 "distribution of electricity" does not include laying the electricity cables. That is very much a lawyer's approach. Even on a lawyer's approach, there is a countervailing argument. Heading 500 states "erecting overhead line supports and aerial masts" is construction. By expressly mentioning "erecting" it implies that the work of laying of the lines on the supports is not construction. By expressly mentioning "overhead" and "aerial" it implies that laying underground cables is not construction. So laying electric cables is not construction in this heading too, and falls under heading 602. That, too, is a lawyer's approach.

(1) [1968] 1 All E.R. 162.

A I reject both these approaches. I prefer to look at the classification somewhat broadly. Under "Construction", the guiding words are "civil engineering work". In ordinary parlance there is a distinction between civil engineering work and electrical engineering work. The tribunal adopted this distinction. They stated:

B "All its (the company's) work is work which the boards themselves would have to do to distribute. None of it falls directly within any wording of heading 500. It is not the type of work which in normal parlance could be called civil engineering work; it is essentially associated with the electrical engineering industry. In these circumstances we do not consider that classification as part of the distribution of electricity (under heading 602) is in any way put in dispute by particular words in heading 500. We come to the conclusion, therefore, that . . . it comes within 602."

C That seems to me to be quite a legitimate method of approach by the tribunal. I would not interfere with them. I would adapt to this case the words of LORD WILBERFORCE in Lord Advocate v. Reliant Tool Co. (2):

D "Exactly at what point [civil engineering work] ends and the [distribution of electricity] begins may often be a matter of opinion. This is for the tribunal of fact to decide. The courts can only overrule their findings if satisfied that no reasonable body could find as they have done."

E Apart from this, I am sure that the legislature did not intend that there should be a difference between the public sector and the private sector. It would be most unfair that the public sector (the area electricity boards) should escape the tax, and that the private sector should have to pay it. I think that the tribunal could themselves properly take that into account.

I would set aside the decision of the Divisional Court and restore the order made by the tribunal. I would allow the appeal accordingly.

F DIPLOCK, L.J.: As LORD DENNING, M.R., has pointed out, it is an appeal from three judges of the Court of Appeal to three other judges of the Court of Appeal. For my part, I find myself in agreement with the majority of my brethren. I agree with all three judgments delivered by the members of the Divisional Court. I agree with them that the distribution of electricity, which to me means the transmission of electric power from one place to another, does not include manufacturing or constructing the means for doing so. It does not seem to me that the tribunal in this case in arriving at the conclusion that they did reach were purporting to do anything else than seeking to apply to the Selective Employment Payments Act 1966 and to the standard industrial classification incorporated in the Act the ordinary principles of legal construction of a document. Indeed, as I read their decision, they arrived at their conclusion by applying what is a well-known technique adopted by lawyers, that is to say, applying to the descriptive words in heading 500, the maxim of construction, expressio unius est exclusio alterius. That is a very good maxim except when you apply it to words which are intended to be illustrative and nothing more, and incorporate expressions like "such as" and "et cetera". I think that they fell into error in applying that maxim. It seems to me that it is that application which led them to the conclusion at which they arrived, and where they added:

I "It is not the type of work which in normal parlance could be called civil engineering work; it is essentially associated with the electrical engineering industry," the tribunal were applying a contrast which was irrelevant to the proper construction of the Act of 1966. The question was not whether it was civil engineering or electrical engineering: it was whether, on the true construction of the Act of 1966, it fell within "The production and distribution of electricity for public supply". A

I think that the Divisional Court were right in reversing the tribunal's decision. I need not rehearse their reasons for doing so; I simply adopt them. I for my part would dismiss this appeal.

SACHS, L.J.: Like SALMON, L.J., when he was sitting as a member of the Divisional Court, I have not found this case easy to determine. In illustration of the difficulties, I may confess that when, by way of a first approach to this matter, I read the judgments of the Divisional Court, the reasoning in them seemed, as one would expect, impeccable and to leave no room for doubt in the realm of legal construction. When, however, I was introduced to the terms of the decision of the tribunal, I was no less impressed by the reasoning in the context of the wide field of industrial affairs. Now, on balance with, I would emphasise, the assistance of the speeches in Lord Advocate v. Reliant Tool Co. (3)—an assistance which the Divisional Court did not have—it seems to me that the case really hinges on certain findings of fact made by the tribunal to which I would respectfully suggest the Divisional Court did not give sufficient weight, as is shown by the somewhat sparse mention made of them in their judgments. B C D

The tribunal, after referring to the potential distinction between civil engineering work and electrical engineering work, stated in their decision:

"Certain things obviously fall under civil engineering work, certain things obviously fall under electrical engineering work"; and then later, when dealing with the work substantially being carried on by the company, further stated E

"It is not the type of work which in normal parlance could be called civil engineering work; it is essentially associated with the electrical engineering industry."

It is true that these two sentences are intertwined with much material which counsel for the Minister has labelled as "an exercise in interpretation". None the less, they seem to me, when taken in the context of the decision as a whole, to constitute a finding by an experienced industrial tribunal that the work of the company fell in the field of the electrical engineering industry and not in that of the civil engineering industry. F

As to the validity of such a finding I respectfully refer, as LORD DENNING, M.R., has referred, to the speech by LORD WILBERFORCE in Lord Advocate v. Reliant Tool Co. (3). One finds this passage (4): G

"The administration of this scheme involves questions of classification. These are certain to be multitudinous and delicate, since no one enterprise is organised exactly like any other, and industrial activities do not readily lend themselves to precise categorisation. The decision of these questions has, therefore, been committed to industrial tribunals as fact-finding bodies." H

Then, in reference to the particular facts of that case, he goes on to use these words (5):

"Exactly at what point the preparation for manufacture ends and the process of manufacture begins may often be a matter of opinion. This is for the tribunal of fact to decide. The courts should only overrule their findings if satisfied that no reasonable body could find as they have done." I

For my part, the more I listened to argument in this case the more important it seemed to give the fullest weight to the factor that in relation to the structure of industry the tribunal has, and the courts have not, that important knowledge

A and experience in the field of industrial affairs which is vital to the determination of issues in relation to that volume entitled "Special Standard Industrial Classification", as regards the composition of which I agree with all that has fallen from LORD DENNING, M.R.

For my part, I too would, adapting what LORD WILBERFORCE said, stress that at what point civil engineering work ends and at what point electrical
B engineering work begins may be often a matter of opinion, but that is for the tribunal of fact to decide. Had the approach indicated by the above cited passages been available for adoption by the Divisional Court, it seems to me that it might well on balance have changed their decision.

I now turn to heading 500. Leaving out references to repairs, one finds that this is in substance a head labelled "Construction"; it deals with erection and
C construction, with the aid of the phrase in the small type portion, "other civil engineering work such as . . ." It seems to me that the linking of the word "construction" and the words "other civil engineering work", leads to the conclusion that the Minister must bring within the ambit of "civil engineering work" any work he desires to say falls under heading 500—unless, of course, it is obviously brought into that heading by some specific later words. To my
D mind the Minister had, on the finding of fact to which I have referred, failed to bring the work of this company within heading 500: indeed, I would go further say that prima facie at least that finding of fact positively excludes the company's work from that heading.

Let me now assume, contrary to my own view but taking the assumption most favourable to the Minister, that the company's work does not prima facie fall
E within heading 602 because of the points made in the Divisional Court and notably those spelled out by SALMON, L.J., as to the meaning of the word "distribution". The result would have been that it would be for the tribunal to have to decide into which heading it fell, for as between heading 500 and heading 602. The decision to be reached in those circumstances seems to me primarily to be one for an industrial tribunal which really understands what work falls within
F the scope of one industry rather than of another, and any finding of theirs seems to fall within the ambit of a finding of fact rather than a finding of a court seeking to achieve an answer by what must necessarily be a somewhat legalistic approach and by discussions which necessarily must appear to those who have real knowledge of industrial affairs to verge on the semantic.

Distinctions as between "distribution" and "means of distribution" come,
G of course, readily to the mind of a court, but yet they may seem unrealistic in regard to the facts of a particular industry; and the same applies to phrases such as "acts preparatory" or "acts preliminary" to some other given function when the industrial tribunal may know on what side of some line the act is regarded as falling in industry. In this particular case the tribunal have found that the work falls within heading 601: that is a conclusion which it was fully
H entitled to reach—and which indeed to my mind at any rate was an almost inevitable result of the finding that the work falls under the category of civil engineering. Those reasons are of themselves sufficient to make it wrong to disturb the tribunal's findings.

Nevertheless from another angle too that decision seems to me right and proper, because in effect this company provided a reserve unit of workmen for carrying
I out the work of the area boards, all of whose work, to my mind, must normally fall prima facie within the ambit of heading 602, and should remain there unless expressly and clearly included in some other heading. Subject, of course, to there being some contrary evidence from experts, the main function of an area board must be to take such steps as are necessary to produce and distribute electricity, including laying any cables (a common task of such boards).

Difficulties in relation to an opposite view become apparent when, for instance, one considers a point relating to repairs. On that point, counsel for the Minister after conceding that repairs would naturally fall within the ambit of distribution, felt it right—and from his point of view I think properly—to resile and to take a more neutral view of the position of “repairs”. It may, however, well be said that if repairs to an underground cable junction fall clearly, as it seems to me, within the ambit of the word “distribution”, that may give a further point in favour of the company’s contention in the present case. Indeed, upon my basic approach, both the laying and the repairs to the cable are industrially within heading 602. A

In that behalf there seems to be reinforcement available from points which may or may not have been fully ventilated before the tribunal or before the Divisional Court. I refer to that approach to the situation which first takes the governing word “Electricity” in heading 602 as being simply a reference to “the electricity industry”, and then looks at words such as “production”, “supply” and “distribution”, with the broadest industrial approach—remembering the words in the introduction to the Standard Industrial Classification at p. 1 where it states that the classification is based on industries. B

Further, on this sort of point, it is perhaps not irrelevant to note, first, that s. 2 (3) (a) (iii) of the Selective Employment Payments Act 1966 itself refers simply to “electricity . . . supply”, a very broad term. It may also not be irrelevant to note that so far as gas is concerned—the production and distribution of gas come under heading 601—a very wide approach might be supported in the way that counsel for the employers adumbrated this morning when he referred to the Gas Act, 1948, and portions of it such as s. 1 (2) (b), s. 74, and Sch. 3, para. 1. C

Those then are the points relevant to that broad approach which seems appropriate to the Standard Industrial Classification. If, however, one turns to a narrower approach and then looks in heading 500 to the words “other civil engineering work such as . . . erecting overhead line supports”, it seems really surprising (if the contentions put forward by counsel for the Minister were correct) that there have not been used the words “overhead lines and their supports”. It does not seem realistic in my opinion that there should be reference to supports without lines and then to say lines are covered; and I would incidentally reserve the point as to what sorts of “supports” an Industrial Tribunal would regard as being the subject-matter of that particular part of heading 500. D

Despite all the cogent points which I have recited, it may yet, in view of the strength of this particular Divisional Court and the judgment of DIPLOCK, L.J., naturally savour of temerity to take a view that the decision of the tribunal was correct—but that is my conclusion. Perhaps I will be comforted in certain future events by the possibility that whoever opens a case of this type seems to have the advantage. Be that as it may, for the reasons which I have given with, I hope, natural diffidence, I agree with LORD DENNING, M.R., that the appeal should be allowed. E

HAVENHAND v. THOMAS BLACK, LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Parker, C.J., Waller and Fisher, J.J.), May 17, 1968.]

Employment—Redundancy Re-engagement Offer in writing Sale of part of business by vendor employers and re-engagement by purchasing employers—Circular letter not showing material differences between old and new terms of employment—Different terms as to notice, overtime wages and insurance scheme—Position as if re-engagement on new contract by vendor employers—Whether re-engagement was in pursuance of an offer in writing within Redundancy Payments Act 1965 (c. 62) s. 3 (2) (b), s. 13 (2).

From 1963 the appellant was employed by the respondents in the coal transport division of their business as a tanker driver. On Aug. 10, 1967, he was notified by circular letter that this side of the business was to be sold to W., Ltd., with effect from Aug. 31, 1967. The circular stated that W., Ltd., "desire all the coal vehicle drivers . . . to remain in the employment of the business . . . and it is hoped that [the arrangements] will be accepted by all concerned . . .". Thereafter some meetings took place between members of the staff and the respondents' company secretary and a representative of W., Ltd. The appellant ceased working for the respondents on Aug. 31, 1967, and started work for W., Ltd. on the next day. About a fortnight later the appellant received from W., Ltd. a notice under s. 4 of the Contracts of Employment Act 1963, setting out the terms of his employment; those differed as to notice, overtime wages, and possibly the insurance scheme, from the terms of his employment with the respondent. The appellant claimed a redundancy payment from the respondents. By virtue of s. 3 (2) (b)* and s. 13 (2)* of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, the appellant would not be regarded† for the purposes of redundancy payment as having been dismissed, and thus would not be entitled to such payment, if his re-engagement by W., Ltd. was in pursuance of an offer in writing within s. 3 (2) (b).

Held: the circular letter of Aug. 10, 1967, was not a sufficient offer in writing for the purposes of s. 3 (2) (b) of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, because the letter did not show the material differences between the proposed new terms of re-engagement and the terms of the previously existing contract of employment, and because (per FISHER, J.) it was not an offer such as would bind in law the new employer, W., Ltd.; accordingly the appellant was entitled to a redundancy payment (see p. 1039, letter I, and p. 1040, letters, C and D, post).

Appeal.

This was an appeal on a point of law by the appellant, George Havenhand, against the decision of the Industrial Tribunal sitting at Sheffield on Dec. 13, 1967, dismissing the appellant's application to the tribunal claiming entitlement to a redundancy payment from the respondents, his former employers. In their reasons the tribunal stated that the appellant's case was virtually indistinguishable from that of a Mr. Jessop: their reasons for their decision in the case of Mr. Jessop are set out at p. 1039, letter G, post.

* Section 3 (2), so far as material, is set out at p. 1039, letters C and D, post and s. 13 (2) is set out at p. 1038, letter I, to p. 1039, letter B, post.

† The considerations leading to this position are stated by LORD PARKER, C.J., at p. 1039, letter E, post, with whom the other members of the court concur (see p. 1039, letter I, and p. 1040, letter D, post).

P. M. Beard for the appellant.

The respondents did not appear and were not represented.

LORD PARKER, C.J.: The appellant, Mr. Havenhand, started work for the respondents on Dec. 2, 1963, as a tanker driver. At the hearing he was described as a tanker driver employed by the respondents on the basis of a fifty-five hour week, a guaranteed eleven hour day, and entitled to bonus under a bonus scheme. On Aug. 10, 1967, the appellant and all the staff of the respondents received a circular or notice entitled "To all drivers and garage staff". Paragraph 1 read:

"Thomas Black, Ltd. have arranged to dispose of the coal transport division of their business to Messrs. J. Wright & Sons, Ltd., ... with effect from the end of the working day on Thursday, Aug. 31, 1967, and Messrs. Wright desire all the coal vehicle drivers and all fitters to remain in the employment of the business which will be transferred to their base ... with the exception of one fitter who will be referred to in a later paragraph."

There then appear specific provisions dealing with tanker drivers of a particular kind and gas department vehicles. Paragraph 4 of the circular says:

"These arrangements have been made in the best interests of the company and of the employees and it is hoped that they will be accepted by all concerned and that the same loyalty will be shown to the new proprietors and that everyone will use their best endeavours to make the changeover and the continuance of the work as smooth and efficient as possible."

Thereafter there seem to have been a number of meetings between members of the staff and a Mr. Hartley, the company secretary, and on some occasion with a Mr. Wright of Wright & Sons, Ltd. In the result, the appellant and other members of the staff became employed on Sept. 1, 1967, by Messrs. Wright. Fourteen days later, the appellant, in company with others, received a notice from Wright & Sons, Ltd. under the Contracts of Employment Act 1963 purporting to set out their terms of employment. It is unnecessary to go through the details, but from that notice the appellant and others came to the conclusion that the terms on which they were employed by Wright & Sons, Ltd., differed in some respects from the terms on which they had been employed by the respondents: in particular the provision for notice was different, wages in regard to overtime were different, and possibly the insurance scheme was different. At any rate the appellant then, while still working in the employ of Wright & Sons, Ltd., claimed from the respondents, his old employers, a redundancy payment.

It is quite clear that his contract with his old employers, the respondents, had terminated; it is quite clear that it was terminated on the sale by the respondents of their coal business to Messrs. Wright, and accordingly it is further clear that he was entitled to a redundancy payment, unless the provisions of s. 13 (2) of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 were satisfied. Accordingly, one looks at s. 13. The provisions of that section shall have effect, so states sub-s. (1), where

"(a) a change occurs (whether by virtue of a sale or other disposition or by operation of law) in the ownership of a business, for the purposes of which a person is employed, or of a part of such a business, and (b) in connection with that change the person by whom the employee is employed immediately before the change occurs (in this section referred to as 'the previous owner') terminates the employee's contract of employment, whether by notice or without notice."

I read that to make it clear that the next subsection applies in the facts of this case. It reads as follows:

"(2) If, by agreement with the employee, the person who immediately after the change occurs is the owner of the business or of the part of the business in question, as the case may be (in this section referred to as 'the

A new owner') renews the employee's contract of employment (with the substitution of the new owner for the previous owner) or re-engages him under a new contract of employment, s. 3 (2) of this Act shall have effect as if the renewal or re-engagement had been a renewal or re-engagement by the previous owner (without any substitution of the new owner for the previous owner)."

B Pausing there, this clearly was not a case of the new owner renewing the contract of employment, because, as I have already said, there were differences in the terms of employment. The appellant was in fact re-engaged under a new contract of employment and accordingly s. 3 (2) is to have effect as if the re-engagement had been a re-engagement by the previous owner. One then goes back to s. 3 (2), and one finds that:

C "An employee shall not be taken for the purposes of this Part of this Act to be dismissed by his employer if his contract of employment is renewed, or he is re-engaged by the same employer under a new contract of employment, and . . . (b) the renewal or re-engagement is in pursuance of an offer in writing made by his employer before the ending of his employment under the previous contract, and takes effect either immediately on the ending of that employment or after an interval of not more than four weeks thereafter."

D Paragraph (b) above is the one that applies in the present case. Accordingly, the effect of s. 3 (2), as I see it, is to provide that the position under s. 13 (2) is to be treated as the same as if the old employer had re-engaged the employee under a new contract of employment. Still on s. 3 (2), in such a case the employee is not to be taken as having been dismissed if in the case of re-engagement under a new contract there has been an offer in writing. Accordingly, as it seems to me, the sole question in this case is whether there has been an offer in writing. For my part, I find it quite unnecessary to go into the question who should give that offer in writing, whether it be the old employer [the respondents], F the old employer on behalf of the new employer, or by the new employer himself, or on behalf of the old employer. The only offer in the present case is the circular of Aug. 10 to which I have referred. The tribunal came to the conclusion that that was a sufficient offer in writing to satisfy the terms of s. 3 (2) (b) of the Act of 1965. The way in which they put it was this, and I am reading from their long decision which they gave in a similar case of a man called Jessop:

G "We feel, however, that on balance, this notification of Aug. 10 does, if taken with the background of interviews and meetings, amount to a sufficient offer in writing of the new contract of employment. Having taken that view it is necessary to say that para. 1 of this notification of Aug. 10 probably could not stand by itself as a sufficient offer, but we do regard it as amplified and clarified by the meetings that took place which were plainly designed H for that very purpose. We find it was a sufficient offer in writing."

In my judgment the tribunal erred in law in coming to that conclusion. It may well be that an offer can and often would be supplemented and explained by subsequent oral interviews, but it is I think clear that the offer in writing which is provided for by s. 3 (2) (b) of the Act of 1965 must be an offer in writing which sets out the material terms of the proposed contract. In a case such as the I present, where the terms of the new contract are different, the offer must descend to sufficient detail to bring to light and show the differences between the proposed contract and the old one. In those circumstances, I have come to the conclusion that this appeal should be allowed and the matter will be remitted to the tribunal to determine the amount of the redundancy payment in default of agreement.

WALLER, J.: I agree. I would add only this, that in my view the provision for an offer in writing is to enable an employee to know the terms of his new contract. This position is made clear from a perusal of the whole of s. 3 (2), of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, which appears to draw a distinction between the renewal of contracts or the re-engagement of employees where the other terms and conditions of the employment do not differ from the corresponding provisions of the previous contract, when no offer in writing would be required: and other cases in sub-s. (2) (b) where the contrast is drawn that in other cases the renewal or re-engagement has to be in pursuance of an offer in writing. In my view that contrast shows clearly that an offer in writing is designed to give to the employee notice of the different terms of his new contract of employment. Obviously an employee who is terminating one employment wishes to know precisely what the different terms will be if he is re-engaged under a new contract of employment. I agree that this document could not possibly be described as an offer in writing in pursuance of sub-s. (2) (b), because, whatever else it did, it did not mention either of the terms which were different from his old contract of employment.

FISHER J.: I agree. Section 3 (2) (b) of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 applies only in a case where the renewal or re-engagement is in pursuance of an offer in writing. In my judgment in a case where s. 13 (2) applies the offer must at any rate be such as in law to bind the new employer.

R. v. BOND.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION (Davies, L.J., Brabin and Browne, JJ.), May 24, 1968.]

Road Traffic—Disqualification for holding licence—Life disqualification—Offender aged twenty-eight—Previous disqualifications extending for some twelve years—Disqualifications not for bad driving—Whether life disqualification, depriving offender of all future opportunity for driving, should stand—Road Traffic Act, 1962 (10 & 11 Eliz. 2 c. 59), s. 5.

By reason of the cumulative effect of prior disqualifications for offences that did not include bad driving, the appellant was already disqualified under s. 5 of the Road Traffic Act, 1962, for holding or obtaining a driving licence until November, 1980, when he was convicted in June, 1966, of taking and driving away a vehicle and driving whilst disqualified. He was disqualified for life for those offences. In August, 1967, he was convicted of similar offences and was again disqualified for life. On appeal against the life disqualifications imposed in 1966 and 1967,

Held: disqualification for life was not appropriate since the appellant should be allowed some hope of driving in the future; accordingly the two orders for life disqualification would be set aside and for each there would be substituted an order for twelve months' disqualification (see p. 1041, letter F, and p. 1042, letter B, post).

[As to disqualification for offences under the Road Traffic Acts, see SUPPLEMENT to 33 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.), para. 1080; and for cases on the subject, see 45 DIGEST (Repl.) 118-119, 409-422.

Appeal.

The appellant, Ernest Brian Bond, appealed against orders disqualifying

A him for holding or obtaining a driving licence which were made on June 22, 1966, and Aug. 1, 1967; leave for this appeal being granted on Jan. 23, 1968, time being then extended for appealing against the order of June, 1966. Diplock, L.J., giving the decision of the court granting leave, stressed that it was the disqualification and not the prison sentences passed on the appellant which the court desired should be considered. The appellant was twenty-eight years of age and there had been many previous orders of disqualification in respect of him, but these orders, particulars of which are in the judgment, were not for offences based on bad driving.

The case noted below* was cited during the argument.

W. E. Denny for the appellant.

The Crown was not represented.

C DAVIES, L.J., delivered the following judgment of the court: This case illustrates the complications that arise out of consecutive periods of disqualification from holding or obtaining a licence to drive a motor vehicle. It has been said more than once that excessive periods of disqualification really do more harm than good, particularly in the case of a man whose occupation is that of a motor driver and whose offences, many and multifarious though they may have been, do not include any offences for careless driving or dangerous driving or anything of that kind, indicating, as in the present case, that he is probably a skilful and good driver but that, possibly by force of circumstances, he will not refrain from taking and driving away motor cars and driving them whilst disqualified and driving them while not insured, as a result of which he now finds himself in the position that as things stand he may never be able lawfully to drive a motor car again. Presumably he will go on driving motor cars, presumably he will go back into prison and remain disqualified all the time. It seems to the court that, although inevitably in the circumstances of this case he is bound to be subject to considerable periods of disqualification, subject to any right that he may have to apply for the restoration of his licence, it is not right to slam the door permanently and for life in his case, and that it would be proper in so far as the court has the power to do so to reduce the overall periods of disqualification to such a time as gives him at least some hope that in the future he may be able to drive a motor car.

I think it is right that I should shortly go through the appellant's recent history with regard to disqualification. On Aug. 23, 1962, he was disqualified for two years; on Oct. 25, 1963, for taking and driving away and driving while disqualified for a further period of three years; on Dec. 4, 1963, in Essex, a further period of ten years' disqualification; on Jan. 22, 1966, at Tower Bridge for similar offences, a further period of eighteen months' disqualification; on May 31, 1966, at Lambeth magistrates' court a further twelve months' disqualification. The court cannot interfere with any of those periods of disqualification, and we are informed by counsel that those disqualifications take him down to Nov. 23, 1980.

Then come the two more recent convictions which are before the court. On June 22, 1966, at Inner London Sessions he was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment for taking and driving away and driving whilst disqualified, and disqualified for life. On Aug. 1, 1967, at Inner London Sessions for similar offences before the same chairman he was again sent to prison and disqualified for life. So that if those disqualifications stand the appellant can never, subject to any opportunity he may have of getting his licence back, drive again.

With regard to the sentence of disqualification on Aug. 1, 1967, the court on Jan. 23, gave him leave to appeal against that disqualification, and also extended his time for applying for leave to appeal against the disqualification of June, 1966.

* R. v. Lambeth Metropolitan Magistrate, Ex p. Everett, [1967] 3 All E.R. 648; [1968] 1 Q.B. 446.

The court refused an application for leave to appeal against the sentence of imprisonment, and so that is not before this court today. A

For the reasons that I attempted to indicate at the beginning of this judgment, we have come to the conclusion that these sentences of life disqualification ought not to stand. The appellant should be given some hope of driving in the future. What the court proposes to do is to impose in respect of the June, 1966, and August, 1967, offences, the minimum periods of disqualification which any court has power to impose, that is to say, twelve months in each case. The two sentences of life disqualification will be set aside, and instead there will be substituted in each case an order for twelve months' disqualification consecutive to each other and consecutive to his existing period of disqualification. ## LUPTON (Inspector of Taxes) v. F. A. & A. B., LTD. D

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Megarry, J.), March 25, 26, 27, 1968.]

Income Tax—Relief—Losses—“Trade” and stock-in-trade—Company dealing in shares and securities—Purchase of shares in other companies—Profit to be made by recovery of income tax on loss claims—Companies' dividends depreciating value of shares—Dividends to accrue over period of years—Not an adventure or concern in the nature of trade—Principle applicable in determining whether such a transaction was a trading transaction—Dividends paid partly out of accumulated profits to which s. 4 of the Act of 1955 applied—Income Tax Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 and 1 Eliz. 2 c. 10), s. 341—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1955 (4 & 5 Eliz. 2 c. 17), s. 4. E

If, on analysis of a transaction in question, its significant elements are found to have a trading purpose, or a purpose of which trade provides the explanation, the presence also of fiscal motives, or elements whose purpose is procuring a benefit from tax consequences, will not necessarily prevent the transaction ranking as one carried on in a trade, for the purpose of a claim for relief for loss under s. 341 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, the question being whether the transaction viewed as a whole is one which can fairly be regarded as a trading transaction (see p. 1051, letters A to D, post). F

Griffiths (Inspector of Taxes) v. J. P. Harrison (Watford), Ltd. ([1962] 1 All E.R. 909) and Bishop (Inspector of Taxes) v. Finsbury Securities, Ltd. ([1966] 3 All E.R. 105) considered. G

In December, 1959, an unlimited company passed a resolution to increase its capital by creating two thousand preferred ordinary shares of £1 each. Subject to the dividends payable on the company's preference shares, the new shares were to carry for a period of five years all dividends that would become payable out of the profits of the company, and after the five years the new shares were to become fixed non-cumulative preference shares carrying a dividend of eight per cent. On a liquidation the shareholders were to be repaid only the amount paid on the shares, and the company could at any time cancel the shares on paying the shareholders the amount paid up. The shares carried no voting rights. They were allotted to the holders of the ordinary shares and credited as fully paid. On the day following the allotment the taxpayer company, a company carrying on a trade as dealer in stocks and shares, purchased the two thousand shares from the nine shareholders for £625,000 in cash, the shareholders warranting that interim dividends of £125,000, net of tax, would be declared in respect of the current H I

A accounting period ending Dec. 31, 1959, and that over the ensuing five years further dividends would be paid amounting to £500,000 net of tax (with provision for damages for breach of warranty for any shortfall). A stakeholder was to hold £500,000 of the purchase price, releasing equivalent amounts as subsequent dividends were paid. Early in 1960 the unlimited company paid dividends of £170,000 net of tax to the taxpayer company (B (£45,000 more than the £125,000 warranted). In March, 1960, the taxpayer company sold the shares to an associated company for £455,000. It claimed to deduct the reduction in price of the shares of £170,000 (plus £3,572 expenses) as a loss sustained in its trade as dealer in stocks and shares, in the computation of its profits for income tax purposes. In four other transactions by the taxpayer company a similar issue was involved. The Special Commissioners of Income Tax found that in each case the process of dividend-stripping was entered into "with the object of making money, bearing in mind the fiscal advantage which it was expected would flow from the transactions": they found that in four cases (including the unlimited company's case) the transaction "would produce loss to [the taxpayer company] unless repayment of income tax was obtained", and in one case "there could be no profit to [the taxpayer company] without such a repayment". In the transaction with the fifth company there was no minimum period for the scheme to work itself out and no special shares were created with special dividend rights, warranties, etc., but there was in effect a warranty of obtaining tax recovery up to £200,000 with supporting arrangements. In two of the transactions the Special Commissioners found that "the dividends were dividends paid partly out of accumulated profits to which the provisions of s. 4 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1955 applied".

E Held: (i) (a) applying to the facts of the present case, (viz., to the transaction involving the £170,000 loss) the principle deduced from the authorities (summarised at p. 1042, letter G, ante), the transaction as a whole was a tax device, not a trading transaction, having regard to the significant elements summarised at (b) below, with the consequence that the taxpayer company was not entitled under s. 341 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, to deduction of the £170,000 in computing its profits for income tax purposes (see p. 1054, letter D, post).

F Cooper (Inspector of Taxes) v. Sandiford Investments, Ltd. ([1967] 3 All E.R. 835) applied.

G (b) significant elements in the transaction in the present case were (first) the elaborate structure of dealing which it involved and that there was little or no other explanation for the inclusion of some provisions than fiscal advantage, (second) that the shares would have to be retained for a substantial period if the full fiscal benefit were to be reaped, and (third) that the creation of special shares carrying special rights as to dividends was involved and these rights were supported by special arrangements to secure payment of stated amounts of dividend (see p. 1053, letters C, E and H and p. 1054, letter A, post).

H (ii) the fifth company's transaction was also a tax device, not a trading transaction, although there was no creation of special shares nor minimum period of operation, because the warranty as to tax recovery coupled with the general motive and purpose of the dealing put the transaction into the same category as the other four (see p. 1054, letter G, post).

I (iii) the fact that in two transactions dividends were paid partly out of accumulated profits to which s. 4 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1955, applied did not involve the consequence that the transactions must be trading transactions, for that enactment was not confined to profits acquired by means of trading transactions (see p. 1055, letter A, post).

Case Stated.

The taxpayer company appealed to the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts against an assessment to income tax in the sum of £1,000 made on it for 1960-61 and claimed relief from tax under s. 341 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, for the years 1959-60, 1960-61 and 1961-62 in respect of losses claimed by the company to have been sustained by it in those years in its trade as a dealer in stocks and shares. The questions for decision remaining in issue before the commissioners were: (i) whether or not shares which the taxpayer company acquired in five other companies were acquired by the taxpayer company in the course of its trade as a dealer in stocks and shares and accordingly formed part of its stock-in-trade; and (ii) whether or not a sum of £13,325 formed part of the cost to the taxpayer company of shares which it acquired in one of the five companies. The commissioners found the following facts, among others. During the years 1959-60, 1960-61 and 1961-62 the taxpayer company was admittedly trading as a dealer in stocks and shares. During the years 1959 and 1960 the taxpayer company acquired certain holdings of shares in S. & Co., L.N.P., Ltd., W.P., Ltd., O.I., Ltd., and B.P., Ltd. The transactions entered into in shares of each of these companies were dividend-stripping transactions. The transaction with S. & Co. is taken in the judgment by way of example and the facts in regard to it are summarised at p. 1046, letter I, post. The transactions with three other companies are not necessary to be stated in this report. The commissioners found that the transaction involving O.I., Ltd., which was also a dividend-stripping transaction, did not involve any creation of shares with special rights. O.I., Ltd., was an investment company which was the parent company of a group of companies carrying on business as copper processors and smelters. By an agreement dated Mar. 30, 1960, the taxpayer company agreed with certain shareholders to purchase 99,702 ordinary shares, 199,404 deferred ordinary shares and 54,851  $6\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. cumulative preference shares of O.I., Ltd., which amounted to the whole of the ordinary, deferred ordinary and preference shares of the company for a total consideration of £1,323,946, payable on completion of the purchase on the following day. F G H I

A A company, Elm Tree Industrial Finance Co., Ltd., was a wholly-owned subsidiary of O.I., Ltd. By cl. 5 (d) of the agreement, to which reference is made at p. 1054, letter E, post, the principal shareholders warranted to the taxpayer company—

B “(d) That the profits of [Elm Tree Industrial Finance Co., Ltd.] at the date hereof (other than profit on capital account) available for distribution by way of dividend to [O.I., Ltd.] shall be sufficient to declare a gross dividend which after deduction of tax at the standard rate in force at the date of payment shall leave the net sum of £800,000 and that if a dividend or dividends shall be declared at any time by [I.O., Ltd.] to [the taxpayer company] out of the said dividend so received by it [the taxpayer company] shall be entitled to and shall recover from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue either directly or by way of set off the tax deducted by [O.I., Ltd.] in paying such dividend Provided always that if [the taxpayer company] shall fail to recover any such tax the shareholders will pay to [the taxpayer company] by way of [liquidated] damages for breach of this undertaking the difference between a sum equal to one half of the tax recovered in the sum of £200,000.”

D The total expenditure incurred by the taxpayer company in connexion with the transaction involving O.I., Ltd. amounted to £1,678,932. During the year ended Mar. 31, 1961 the taxpayer company received dividends on shares acquired by it in O.I., Ltd. amounting in all to £800,000 net of tax. The net value of the combined assets and liabilities of O.I., Ltd. as at Mar. 31, 1961, was £695,952, and in the accounts of [the taxpayer company] for the year ended Mar. 31, 1961, the shares held in O.I., Ltd. were written down to that figure. On the basis of the Mar. 31, 1961, value of £695,952 the taxpayer company sustained a net loss on the O.I., Ltd. transaction at that date, after taking account of the net dividend received, of £182,980, subject, however, to the undertaking contained in the proviso to cl. 5 (d) of the sale agreement. The trading loss claimed by the taxpayer company to have been sustained by it in 1960-61 in respect of this transaction was £182,980 plus £800,000, viz., £982,980.

E The Crown contended before the commissioners as follows: (i) that the transactions whereby the taxpayer company acquired shares in S. & Co., L.N.P., Ltd., W.P., Ltd., O.I., Ltd., and B.P., Ltd. were not transactions entered into by the taxpayer company in the course of trade; (ii) that the shares in these companies acquired by the taxpayer company did not at any time form part of the taxpayer company's stock-in-trade; and (iii) formally, but without argument, that the four transactions involving forward dividend-stripping were not trading transactions because they necessarily involved acquisition with a view to holding and so were akin to investments.

G The taxpayer company contended before the commissioners: (a) that the shares which it acquired in S. & Co., L.N.P., Ltd., W. P., Ltd., O.I., Ltd., and B.P., Ltd., were acquired by it in the course of its trade as a dealer in stocks and shares and formed part of its stock-in-trade; and (b) that the claims made by the taxpayer company under s. 341 of the Income Tax Act 1952 for the years 1959-60, 1960-61 and 1961-62 should accordingly be allowed.

H The commissioners held, inter alia, that

I As regards the five transactions involving dividend-stripping, the dividend-stripping transactions which were in issue in *Griffiths (Inspector of Taxes) v. J. P. Harrison (Watford), Ltd.** and Bishop (Inspector of Taxes) v. Finsbury Securities, Ltd.†, were there held to be within the scope of a trade of dealing in shares. Bearing in mind the opinions given in the House of Lords in the former, and the judgments given in the Court of Appeal in the latter, of these cases, the commissioners found on the evidence adduced in the present case that the five dividend-stripping transactions entered into by [the taxpayer company] formed part of that company's trade of dealing in shares. They concluded accordingly that [the taxpayer company] was entitled for the years 1959-60, 1960-61 and 1961-62 to relief from tax under s. 341 of the Income Tax Act 1952 on an amount of its income equal to the amount of any loss sustained by it for those years in its trade of dealing in shares, such loss being computed on the basis that the above-mentioned transactions formed part of that trade.

† [1965] 3 All E.R. 337.

The Crown appealed by way of Case Stated to the High Court.

The case noted below* was cited during the argument in addition to the cases referred to in the judgment.

Hubert H. Monroe, Q.C., J. R. Phillips and J. P. Warner for the Crown.
Heyworth Talbot, Q.C., and M. P. Nolan for the taxpayer company.

MEGARRY, J.: This is a Case Stated by the Special Commissioners. It relates to relief claimed by the taxpayer company, F.A. & A.B., Ltd., under s. 341 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, in respect of the years 1959-60, 1960-61 and 1961-62. The claim relates to losses in the taxpayer company's trade as a dealer in stocks and shares. It is accepted on all hands that during these years the company was trading as a dealer in stocks and shares. Throughout there has been no suggestion that any of the transactions concerned were sham or in any way otherwise than they appeared to be.

The case relates to five transactions involving dividend-stripping, for the most part forward dividend-stripping but in some cases involving some backward dividend-stripping. The commissioners found in each case that the taxpayer company entered into the transactions "with the object of making money, bearing in mind the fiscal advantages which it was expected would flow from the transactions."

They found that these transactions formed part of the taxpayer company's trade of dealing in shares, and on this footing held that the trading losses for the three years were, for 1959-60, £46,644; for 1960-61, £1,016,477; and for 1961-62, £15,425. The question of law, which is more fully stated in para. 9 (5), (6) and para. 12 of the Case Stated is, shortly, whether there was evidence on which the Special Commissioners could come to this conclusion. Both sides accept that the question for this court is one of law as, indeed, Bishop (Inspector of Taxes) v. Finsbury Securities, Ltd. (1) to which I am about to refer goes far to establish (2).

Much of the argument in the case has turned on two decisions of the House of Lords on dividend-stripping, Griffiths (Inspector of Taxes) v. J. P. Harrison (Watford), Ltd. (3) and Bishop (Inspector of Taxes) v. Finsbury Securities, Ltd. (1). The Harrison case (3), which was decided by a majority of three to two in favour of the taxpayer, was duly considered by the commissioners. On the other hand, the Finsbury case (1), a decision in favour of the Crown, had not been decided by the House of Lords at the time, and the commissioners had before them only the majority decision of the Court of Appeal (4) in favour of the taxpayer, a decision which the House of Lords was later unanimously to reverse.

I will take the facts of the first of the five transactions as an example of the problem. This, next to the fourth transaction, was the transaction which counsel for the taxpayer company selected as being most favourable to his case, a selection with which counsel for the Crown agreed. The facts are fully set out in the Case and I refer to the essentials only. It concerns the firm of Sotheby & Co., which is an unlimited company. The first step was that on Dec. 21, 1959, Messrs. Sotheby held an extraordinary general meeting, and at that meeting a resolution

- A to increase the capital by creating two thousand preferred ordinary shares of £1 each was duly passed. The shares themselves were extraordinary to the extent that, subject to the dividends payable on Messrs. Sotheby's preference shares, the new shares for a period of five years carried all dividends out of the profits of the company (other than profits on capital account), and thereafter became fixed non-cumulative preference shares carrying a dividend of eight
- B per cent. Further, on liquidation there was to be a repayment of the amount paid up, and no more. It was also provided that Messrs. Sotheby could at any time cancel the shares on paying the shareholders an amount equal to the amount paid up on the shares. The shares carried no other rights as to voting or otherwise. These new shares were duly allotted, credited as fully paid, among the holders of the ordinary shares.

- C The next day, on Dec. 22, 1959, the taxpayer company entered into a contract with the nine shareholders in Messrs. Sotheby for the purchase of these two thousand shares for £625,000 cash down, with completion that day. The shareholders undertook and warranted to the taxpayer company that interim dividends of £125,000, net of tax, would be declared in respect of the current accounting period ending Dec. 31, 1959, and would be paid to the taxpayer company within
- D seven days of completion. There was also a warranty that further dividends would be paid to the taxpayer company during the five years from the date of the contract amounting (net of tax) to £500,000; and there was an agreement to pay to the taxpayer company as liquidated damages for breach of warranty a sum equal to any shortfall, with a further sum if less than £100,000 was paid.

- E On the same day the taxpayer company, the shareholders and a company called Northern Holdings, Ltd., made a contract whereby Northern Holdings, Ltd. (who were described as "the stakeholders") were to hold £500,000 out of the £625,000 paid by the taxpayer company. This was to be held on behalf of the shareholders and also as security for the undertaking and warranty for the benefit of the company. As and when dividends were paid in excess of the initial £125,000, the stakeholders were to release equivalent amounts out of the
- F £500,000 to the shareholders; and if there was any breach of warranty by the shareholders the stakeholders were to pay the taxpayer company the damages out of the £500,000. By a letter dated the same day from Hambros Bank to the taxpayer company the bank undertook to "extend sufficient facilities" to the stakeholders to enable them to carry out their obligations under the agreement.

- G Between then and Mar. 31, 1960, Messrs. Sotheby declared dividends which were paid to the taxpayer company amounting to £170,000 net of tax. These dividends consisted of the £125,000 together with £45,000 more. On Mar. 31, 1960, the taxpayer company sold the shares to another company called U.G.S. Finance, Ltd., for £455,000. Both the taxpayer company and U.G.S. Finance, Ltd., were members of a group of companies of which Barro Equities, Ltd., was the parent company. The taxpayer company incurred legal costs and
- H stamp duty amounting to £3,572. Commercially, the result of the course of dealing was that the taxpayer company received net dividends of £170,000 and sold the shares for £170,000 less than the company had paid for them, so that the net loss was merely the expenses of £3,572. But for the purpose of s. 341 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, the dividends (which had already suffered deduction of tax) must be ignored, and so the loss claimed is £173,572. If that
- I sum is a "loss" which the taxpayer company has sustained "in any trade . . . carried on by" the company within s. 341, the claim is valid. The question is whether it is such a loss. By s. 526 (1) of the Act of 1952, except so far as is otherwise provided or the context otherwise requires, "trade" includes "every trade, manufacture, adventure or concern in the nature of trade". The term "trade" is thus left undefined; for this provision relates to the ambit of the word "trade" rather than its meaning, and if it were to be treated as a definition it would be open to the valid semasiological thrust that there is little profit in seeking to define a word in terms of itself.

I now turn to the two leading cases of Harrison (5) and Finsbury (6). In A Harrison (5) the company bought all the shares in C., Ltd., for £16,900. C., Ltd., declared a net dividend of some £15,900, and the company then sold the shares for £1,000, claiming a loss of £15,900 for the purposes of s. 341. The Special Commissioners held that this was not a trading loss, but DANCKWERTS, J., the Court of Appeal (with DONOVAN, L.J., dissenting), and the House of Lords (with LORD REID and LORD DENNING dissenting), all held that they were wrong. B VISCOUNT SIMONDS said this (7):

"I hope that I do no injustice to the argument for the Crown if I say that it rested entirely on the proposition that the essence of a trading transaction is that its object is to make a profit and that the found object of this transaction was the ulterior one of obtaining a dividend against which it could claim to set off its losses."

This contention he rejected, and he held that a transaction could perfectly well be a trading transaction even though it made and was intended to make a loss. On this point I may observe that during the argument of this case examples were taken such as the well-known "loss leaders" which certain supermarkets offer for sale, being goods on which no profit or, indeed, an outright loss, will be made, in the hope that the attractions of these goods will bring customers to the store who will purchase other goods which will show the store a profit. Again, the instance was taken of a company trading at a loss under difficult commercial conditions because it wishes to keep its experienced staff together and has future developments in mind which it hopes will shortly restore its profits, if only it still has that staff.

LORD SIMONDS also said this (8):

"It appears to me to be wholly immaterial, so long as the transaction is not a sham, . . . what may be the fiscal result or the ulterior fiscal object of the transaction, and since this can be the only ground on which the commissioners could have reached their determination, I must conclude that it cannot be upheld."

He thus rejected the test of looking to see whether the purposes of the transaction is a fiscal purpose.

LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST said this (9):

"... it seems to me that a trading transaction does not cease to be such merely because it is entered into in the confident hope that, under an existing state of the law, some fiscal advantage will result. In judging the essential nature of a transaction it will often be relevant and of assistance to consider the objects and intentions which are the inspiration of the transaction. In the present case, however, I cannot think that there is room for doubt as to the essential nature of the transaction: it was a transaction which was demonstrably of a trading nature and it was not divested of that nature merely because it was entered into with the expectation that as a result (but not as part of the trading activity of the company as such) some tax recovery might be claimed."

LORD GUEST (10) said that it

"... by no means follows, that the absence of an intention to make a profit or the intention to make a loss negatives trading. The test is an objective one. The question to be asked is not, quo animo was the transaction entered into but what in fact was done by the company . . ."

He added that (10), in his opinion,

- A "...one has to look at the transaction by itself irrespective of the object, irrespective of the fiscal consequences, and ask the question in Lord President CLYDE's words in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Livingston (11): 'whether the operations involved in it are of the same kind, and carried on in the same way, as those which are characteristic of ordinary trading in the line of business in which the venture was made'."
- B It seems to me that this is a narrow decision on a narrow point. The case merely decides that a transaction is not prevented from being a trading transaction merely because its object is not to make a trading profit but to obtain a tax advantage. The transaction involved was a simple transaction of purchasing, reaping the dividend, and selling. It involved no superstructure of specially created shares of an extraordinary nature, or warranties, or a stakeholder or the like. So far as the purpose of the transaction is concerned it appears that LORD SIMONDS and LORD GUEST were taking the view that this had to be disregarded, whereas LORD MORRIS said that it was often relevant. A possible answer, simply on that decision alone, might be this: that if, as in that case, the nature of the transaction is clear, then the object or purpose does not affect it, but that if the nature of the transaction is less than clear then it may be
- D permissible to look at the objective in order to explain the nature of the transaction.
- In the Pinsbury case (12) the headnote summarises the arrangement in the majority of the fifteen cases in question in the following way:
- E "The company to be 'stripped' created a small number of preference shares which, in addition to a normal fixed interest dividend, were to carry, for short periods of years, special net dividends amounting to the whole of the company's anticipated net profits from its business for the period of years, up to a stated maximum. The respondent thereupon bought those shares, the purchase price being the stated maximum (which was to be reduced to the extent that the special dividends over the period fell below that maximum) plus one-half of any referable tax repayments on any loss claim established by the respondent under s. 341. Each year the value of the shares fell by reason of the dividends paid. In the minority of the fifteen cases the respondent bought the shares of a company having one asset which it expected to turn into a profit in about a year, and the respondent took that profit in the form of a dividend, leaving the shares with a nominal value only."
- F
- G The Special Commissioners in that case held that the case was not distinguishable from the Harrison case (13) and found for the company on this point. BUCKLEY, J. (14) upheld this decision, and in the Court of Appeal (15) the decision was affirmed on somewhat different grounds, LORD DENNING, M.R., dissenting. The House of Lords (16) unanimously allowed the appeal by the Crown, and all their Lordships concurred in the speech delivered by LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST. In that speech (17) he distinguished the Harrison case (13) on the ground that the arrangements there were essentially different. There,
- H "...the transaction was demonstrably a share-dealing transaction. Shares were bought: a dividend on them was received: later the shares were sold."
- I LORD MORRIS went on to deal with the question of motive. He said this (17):
- "There may be occasions when it is helpful to consider the object of a transaction when deciding as to its nature. In the Harrison case (13) my view was that there could be no room for doubt as to the real and genuine nature of the transaction. The fact that the reason why it was entered into was that the provisions of the revenue law gave good ground for thinking that welcome fiscal benefit could follow did not in any way change the character of the transaction."

It seems to me that LORD MORRIS is there saying that, if, looking at the transaction, it is clear that it is or is not a trading transaction, motive is irrelevant. In choosing what dealings to transact a trader does not cease to trade merely because he prefers to transact those dealings which are fiscally beneficial and to reject those that lack this advantage. The discovery of a motive for carrying out a transaction must not be confounded with an analysis of the nature of the transaction itself.

What, then, are the "occasions when it is helpful to consider the object of a transaction when deciding as to its nature"? (I again quote the words of LORD MORRIS (18).) I do not think that it can merely be that the transaction is unusual or extraordinary. The question under s. 341 is not that of a loss in any "ordinary trade" but that of a loss in a "trade", simpliciter; and many transactions, though clearly extraordinary, are nonetheless trading transactions. Nor, for the reasons that I have just given, do I consider that the test can be whether the transaction would have been entered into if there had been no question of tax advantage; in any case that would, I think, be contrary to the Harrison case (19). But if when the constituent elements of a transaction are examined it is found that there are many elements the presence of which cannot be explained on any sensible trading ground but which are readily intelligible on fiscal grounds, then, in my judgment, the fiscal grounds may become relevant; for the fiscal element has invaded the transaction itself, moulding and explaining it, and is not merely the purpose or object for which a trading transaction is carried through.

I think this view gains some support from the words of a strong Board of the Judicial Committee in a Privy Council case from Ceylon, Iswera v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (20). There, in considering the words "every trade and manufacture, and every adventure and concern in the nature of trade" in what was said to be a definition of "trade", LORD REID, speaking for the Board, said this (21):

"If, in order to get what he wants, the taxpayer has to embark on an adventure which has all the characteristics of trading, his purpose or object alone cannot prevail over what he in fact does. But if his acts are equivocal his purpose or object may be a very material factor when weighing the total effect of all the circumstances."

As in all such cases, it may well be difficult to draw the line. At one extreme lies a transaction which is merely a trading transaction. In such a case the transaction is not deprived of its trading nature merely by the presence of a fiscal motive for carrying it out nor by the fact that as a trading transaction it makes a loss and not a profit. That, in the barest of outlines, is the Harrison case (19). At the other extreme lies a transaction that is far removed from trading, designed to secure a tax advantage. There, the mere fact that the transaction includes the purchase and sale of shares by a trader in shares does not of itself suffice to make it a trading transaction. That, again in the barest of outlines, is the Finsbury case (22). Between these two extremes lies a continuous spectrum of possible transactions in which the elements of trading become smaller and smaller in relation to the elements of securing a tax advantage. A sufficiency of reported cases may in due course provide the co-ordinates which will make it possible to plot the position of the dividing line; but in this case I am not

A required to do more than decide whether these transactions fall on the right side or the wrong side of any reasonable line that could be drawn.

In doing that, it seems to me that I must have regard to the following principles. If on analysis it is found that the greater part of the transaction consists of elements for which there is some trading purpose or explanation (whether ordinary or extraordinary), then the presence of what I may call "fiscal elements",
B inserted solely or mainly for the purpose of producing a fiscal benefit, may not suffice to deprive the transaction of its trading status. The question is whether, viewed as a whole, the transaction is one which can fairly be regarded as a trading transaction. If it is, then it will not be denatured merely because it was entered into with motives of reaping a fiscal advantage. Neither fiscal elements nor fiscal motives will prevent what in substance is a trading transaction from
C ranking as such. On the other hand, if the greater part of the transaction is explicable only on fiscal grounds, the mere presence of elements of trading will not suffice to translate the transaction into the realms of trading. In particular, if what is erected is predominantly an artificial structure, remote from trading and fashioned so as to secure a tax advantage, the mere presence in that structure of certain elements which by themselves could fairly be described as trading
D will not cast the cloak of trade over the whole structure. In speaking of the greater part of the transaction I am not, of course, referring to mere bulk. A long document, like a long speech, may do and say remarkably little. What seems to me to be of particular importance is the relative extent of the significant provisions which are made.

One may look at matters in a slightly different way. I think that some assistance might be gained from considering the comment which a hypothetical, sapient and impartial trader in shares would make when confronted with the details of a transaction. Is he to be imagined as saying: "That's obviously share trading", or, perhaps, "What an unusual but interesting way of share trading", or would he exclaim: "Whatever that is, it is not share trading"?
E If he were to be endowed with the qualities of a professional accountant as well, perhaps the answers might be rephrased as: "That's an adventure or concern
F in the nature of trade" on the one hand, and on the other: "If this can be called an adventure or concern at all, its nature is that of a tax recovery device remote from trade."

With these considerations in mind I must deal with certain submissions made by counsel for the taxpayer company. In the forefront of his argument was his
G emphasis on the differences between the facts of the present case and those in the Finsbury case (23). There, the vendors of the shares were to have half of the tax recovered, so that the sale price would be augmented, and the transaction was at least in part for their benefit. Here, there was a fixed sale price in each of the five cases, he said, with no provision for augmentation out of any tax recovered. Only in two cases (Nos. 3 and 5) did the tax recovery affect the
H vendors, and then only to accelerate the payment of the instalments to the vendors. Secondly, he said that in the Finsbury case (23) there was an obligation on the company (which seems to have been a contractual obligation) to hold the shares for the mutual benefit of vendors and purchaser. Here, there is no such obligation. Counsel for the taxpayer company carefully analysed the speech of LORD MORRIS (24), and urged with force and clarity that as there were these
I differences the Finsbury case (23) did not apply, and the present case therefore fell within the embrace of the Harrison case (25). With all proper decorum he submitted that it was not for me to say whether the facts of this case sufficed to distinguish it from the Harrison case (25); once he had demonstrated that the facts of this case were significantly different from those of the Finsbury case (23), it must be left to the House of Lords to say whether those facts justified another exception or qualification being made to the principles of the Harrison case (26), to stand side by side with the Finsbury case (27). A

I hope that I do not fall too gravely below the accustomed standards of courtesy of counsel for the taxpayer company when I say that I have never met this approach to the doctrine of precedent before, and I hope never to meet it again. In my judgment, it is plainly heterodox. As I conceive it, my duty is to distil from the authorities the principles of law laid down in them and then to apply those principles to the case before me, whatever the facts. Principles, not facts, are the life of the doctrine of precedent; and to those who seek to apply the doctrine by matching fact against fact, I would say qui haeret in litera haeret in cortice. Certainly I do not read the Finsbury decision (27) as saying that where the particular facts of that case exist, then to that extent, and to that extent only, an inroad is made on the Harrison rule (26). That would accord to the Harrison case (26) an unwarranted paramountcy; and, in saying that, I do not forget that the pronouncement in the House of Lords which modified the former practice of treating the House as being strictly bound by its own decisions (28) was made immediately before judgment in the Finsbury case (27) was delivered. As I see it, my duty is to apply the principles that I find in the two cases when fairly read together. As I have already indicated, I consider that the Finsbury case (27) is far broader in its principles than counsel for the taxpayer company would have me recognise. The facts of that case mentioned in the report (29) were the foundation for the decision of the House of Lords that the transactions were not in the nature of trade but were solely artificial devices remote from trade to secure a tax advantage. Other facts in other cases may well reveal that other transactions merit the same classification; and if they do, I conceive it the duty of any court or tribunal, however lowly, to say so. It would be wrong to confound the facts of a case in which a principle emerges with the principle itself. B

In this view, I derive some comfort from the judgment of BUCKLEY, J., in Cooper (Inspector of Taxes) v. Sandiford Investments, Ltd. (30), a case on which counsel for the Crown relied but counsel for the taxpayer company abstained from comment. The facts there were very different; but the judge had the two House of Lords decisions before him, and in reaching his conclusion that the case before him was on the Finsbury (27) side of the line, he relied on three main points. These were, first, the complexity of the transactions; secondly, the fact that it was manifest that there would be a loss unless the transactions were held to be trading transactions; and thirdly, that the scheme would be profitable only if the shares were held until the scheme was worked out. He said (31): C D E F G

“These considerations all seem to me to indicate not merely that this was not an ordinary trading transaction, but that it was a transaction entered into with the primary and indeed the only object of obtaining a profit by means of the fiscal consequences which will flow from the scheme if the taxpayer company's claims can be substantiated. In other words the shares in Fragmap company were not acquired by the taxpayer company in order to derive a profit in the course of carrying on their business of traders in securities, but were acquired in order to obtain a profit from them in consequence of the fiscal consequences which, if the company's claims were right, would result in a profit. If, however, their claims were not sustainable the H I

- A transaction would involve the taxpayer company in a loss. These considerations, in my judgment, deprive this transaction of the character of a trading transaction. It becomes, I think, much more like what the House of Lords had to consider in the Finsbury Securities case (32) and is appropriately described as an artificial device remote from the taxpayer company's trading activities, designed to secure a tax advantage. It was, in my judgment, a
- B transaction into which the taxpayer company would never have entered at all but for the hope that it would result in fiscal advantages."

These last words, I think, clearly relate not merely to motive but also to the shape of the transaction itself. Like BUCKLEY, J., I would regard the constituent parts of each of these transactions with which I am concerned "as part and parcel of one composite transaction": I take this phrase from his judgment (33). So regarded, the question for me is whether these five transactions are on the Harrison side (34) of the line or the Finsbury side (32).

- C In answering this question, I would look, first, at the somewhat elaborate structure of dealings in each case. That by itself would not necessarily take the transactions out of the category of trading, for there may be trading transactions of great complexity. Indeed, at one stage of the argument counsel for the taxpayer company roundly asserted that the greater the complexity the more assured it was that there was trading. I would agree with him if the complexity is a trading complexity. For in my view the answer to his assertion is that complexity per se proves little; what matters is the kind of complexity. A complexity of trading provisions will reinforce the trading nature of a trading transaction; a complexity of fiscal provisions will subtract from it. Here there is little or no explanation for the inclusion of some of the provisions other than
- D fiscal advantage. The Special Commissioners have found that
- E

- "the five transactions involving dividend-stripping summarised in the previous sub-paragraph were entered into by [the taxpayer company] with the object of making money, bearing in mind the fiscal advantages which it was expected would flow from the transaction. In relation to S. and Co., W.P., Ltd., O.I., Ltd., and B.P., Ltd., the transaction in each case would produce a loss to [the taxpayer company] unless repayment of income tax was obtained, and in relation to L.N.P., Ltd., there could be no profit to [the taxpayer company] without such a repayment."
- F

- G The wording of this finding might perhaps have been more explicit, but, read fairly, I think it is reasonably plain that the Special Commissioners are saying that the sole purpose of the transactions was to obtain the fiscal advantages that they would confer. I find this far from surprising; and on this footing it is not unexpected to find that the fiscal objective has failed to remain aloof and on the horizon, and has thrust into the transactions substantive provisions designed to achieve the fiscal purpose.
- H

- I Secondly, although there is no contractual requirement that the shares should be retained for any particular period, the arrangements are such that in order to reap the full fiscal benefit for the vendor and the taxpayer alike, the shares must be retained by the company, or by a member of the company's group, for a substantial period which will allow the scheme to work itself out. In three cases there is a maximum period of five years, and in one, the W.P., Ltd. case, it is about a year and a half. In the remaining case, that of O.I., Ltd., there is no such period. In the four cases, if during the period of the scheme the shares were sold outside the group, the tax advantage would to this extent be lost. Accordingly, the carrying out of the scheme renders the shares less readily

(32) [1966] 3 All E.R. 105.

(33) [1967] 3 All E.R. at p. 839, letter C.

(34) [1962] 1 All E.R. 909; 40 Tax Cas. 281.

saleable; and this can hardly be a characteristic of trading in shares. Thirdly, in all the cases except one (that of O.I., Ltd.) the scheme involved the creation of special shares which carried special rights as to dividends, supported by an arrangement which by warranties or otherwise secured the payment of stated amounts by way of dividend. A

I do not think that the right approach is, after analysing each transaction meticulously, to compare the constituent elements with those present or absent in other cases and then to decide the matter on the degree of correspondence or divergence. Instead, I consider that each arrangement should be regarded as a whole in the light of the principles which I have derived from the cases. If at the end of the day a transaction, viewed as a whole, appears to be merely, or substantially, a trading transaction, then despite the presence of fiscal elements or fiscal motives a trading transaction it remains. If, on the other hand, the transaction as a whole appears to be no trading transaction but an artificial device remote from trade to secure a tax advantage, then the presence of trading elements in it will not secure its classification as a trading transaction. When I look at the matter in that light and bear in mind the documents in each transaction, which I have carefully re-read in the light of the arguments advanced before me, I reach the clear conclusion that four out of the five transactions (that is, all except No. 4, the O.I., Ltd., case) are not trading transactions but tax devices. I would accordingly in those four cases reverse the decision of the Special Commissioners, who, of course, lacked my advantage of being able to consider the decision of the House of Lords in the Finsbury case (35). B C D

That leaves me with No. 4, the O.I., Ltd. case. This differs from the other cases in the manner that I have indicated. Counsel for the Crown has pointed to certain elements in the O.I., Ltd. case which nevertheless suffice, he says, to bring it into the same category as the other four. What he relies on is primarily cl. 5 (d) of the sale agreement, which contains what is in effect a warranty of obtaining tax recovery up to an amount of £200,000. This provision is supported by the provisions of cl. 9 (b) and is further supported by cl. 3 of the stakeholding agreement. Counsel accepted that there was no period of duration written into the agreement, other than a provision in the stakeholding agreement which released the stakeholder after a period of three years. Apart from these elements he was able to point to nothing in the transaction (except, of course, the general motive and purpose of the dealing) which put it into the same category as the other four. The short question, which I have found difficult, comes to whether the significance of the provisions he has referred to, viewed in the context of the transaction as a whole, is sufficient to put the case into the same category as the others. My mind has fluctuated more than once in the course of the argument, but in the end, though I confess with some hesitation, I have come to the conclusion that these provisions are of sufficient significance to achieve this result; and accordingly the decision in that case will be the same as in the others. E F G

Finally, I must mention one other point which counsel for the taxpayer company advanced with what in the circumstances may equally be described as appropriate force and appropriate diffidence. In the first and fifth of the transactions, he said, the Special Commissioners had held that H

“the dividends were dividends paid partly out of accumulated profits to which the provisions of s. 4 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1955, applied.” I

I read from the statement in the first of the cases; the statement in the fifth is almost identical. This, he said, showed that the transactions were trading transactions: the Crown could hardly apply the section to a part of the profits and in the same breath say that the transactions were not trading transactions.

- A The answer, I think, lies in the terms of s. 4 (1) of the Act of 1955 (36). There is nothing in the section to confine it to cases where the profits were acquired by means of a trading transaction. True, the section is confined in its application to those who are engaged in a trade consisting of or comprising dealings in shares or other investments; but it is not, at any rate in terms, limited to acquisitions made by way of trading in shares. The subsection speaks as to the activities
- B carried on by the person acquiring the shares and not as to the mode of acquisition of those shares. All that is required is that the shares should have been sold or issued to him or otherwise acquired by him within certain limits of dates. In such cases the section bites; and a dealer in shares should accordingly have a care in acquiring for any purpose, whether or not for resale or other dealings, any shares to which the section can apply. In any case, I very much doubt
- C whether the Special Commissioners were intending to do more than say that the accumulated profits were profits of a type which fell within s. 4; and I would not attempt in this oblique way to spell out of their words a finding as to the mode of acquisition. Even if there were such a finding, I may add, it might be wrong in law. I do not think there is anything in this point save the initial elegance of what, on examination, emerges as a fallacious dilemma.

(36) Section 4 (1), so far as relevant, provides: "Purchases of shares by financial concerns and persons exempted from tax.—Where a person engaged in carrying on a trade which consists of or comprises dealings in shares or other investments becomes entitled to receive a dividend on a holding of shares of any class to which this section applies, . . . and the dividend is to any extent paid out of profits accumulated before the date on which the shares were so acquired, then, if those shares, or those shares together with—

(c) any such shares as are to be brought into account under subsection (3) of this section, amount to ten per cent. or more of the issued shares of that class, the net amount of the dividend received on the shares in the holding shall, to the said extent to which it was paid out of profits accumulated before the shares were acquired, be brought into account in computing the profits or gains or losses of the trade as if it were a trading receipt which had not borne tax."

R. v. HUNT.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION (Lord Parker, C.J., Davies, L.J. and Brabin, J.) May 27, 1968.]

Criminal Law—Verdict—Inconsistent verdicts—Burden on appellant to satisfy the court that the verdicts could not stand together—Charges of grievous bodily harm to B. and of assault occasioning actual bodily harm to H.—Charges arising out of acts on same occasion—Issue of identity of single assailant—Appellant acquitted of causing grievous bodily harm to B. but convicted of assault occasioning actual bodily harm to H. Whether verdicts could stand together.

On an evening in August, 1967, H., his wife and B. were walking in the street and met four young men, F., T., R. and the appellant, walking abreast. H. was struck with the knee by one of the men and was hit a glancing blow with his fist, and B. was struck in the face with a fist and fell, suffering a fractured skull. At the trial of the appellant neither H. nor his wife could identify H.'s assailant, though she testified that the same man assaulted both H. and B. F. and T. gave evidence that it was the appellant who assaulted H. and B. The appellant's defence was that T. was the assailant, and that, as the appellant had a damaged hand (which was the fact), he could not have assaulted B. with the force alleged. The appellant was acquitted on counts 1 and 2 (which charged causing grievous bodily harm to B. with intent, and inflicting grievous bodily harm on B.), but he was convicted on count 3 (which charged assaulting H., thereby occasioning him actual bodily harm). The jury's verdict was expressed on counts 1 and 2 as "insufficient evidence" and so not guilty, but on count 3 they found the appellant guilty. On appeal against conviction on count 3, on the ground that the verdict on count 3 was inconsistent with the verdict on counts 1 and 2,

Held: the burden of establishing inconsistent verdicts which could not stand together because a reasonable jury could not have reached them, or which it would be unsafe to allow to stand, was on the appellant; in the present case the court was not satisfied that only an unreasonable jury could have reached these verdicts (e.g., the first two counts charged grievous bodily harm, and the appellant's damaged hand might have left the jury in doubt whether he could have struck the blow that knocked B. down), and accordingly the verdict on count 3 should stand (see p. 1058, letters F and H, post).

Appeal.

This was an appeal by Ronald Richard Hunt against his conviction on Oct. 13, 1967, at Bedford Assizes before GEOFFREY LANE, J., and a jury, on count 3 of an indictment of assaulting one Harlow and occasioning him actual bodily harm. He was convicted also on count 4 of a similar offence against Police Sgt. Jackson. The appellant had pleaded guilty to assaulting Sgt. Jackson (count 5) in the execution of his duty and to escaping from lawful custody (count 6). He was also in breach of a probation order. He was sentenced to concurrent terms of one years' imprisonment on count 5 and of six months' imprisonment on count

I

A 6, and of one year's imprisonment for breach of a probation order. On count 3, the assault on Mr. Harlow, the appellant was sentenced to one year's imprisonment consecutive to the other sentences, making three years in all. The appellant had been acquitted on two other counts of the indictment, viz., count 1, causing to one Bourne grievous bodily harm with intent, and, count 2, inflicting grievous bodily harm on Mr. Bourne. On May 6, 1968, the court (LORD PARKER, C.J., B WINN, L.J., and ROSKILL, J.) gave leave to appeal on count 3, on the question whether the verdict convicting the appellant of assault on Mr. Harlow could stand with the verdicts of acquittal of attacks on Mr. Bourne (counts 1 and 2), the principal issue being one of the identity of the assailant of both Mr. Harlow and Mr. Bourne. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

C The cases noted below* were cited during the argument in addition to the cases referred to in the judgment of the court.

Eric Stockdale for the appellant.

LORD PARKER, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court:
At Bedford Assizes, on Oct. 13, 1967, the appellant was convicted of assaulting D Police Sergeant Jackson, thereby occasioning him actual bodily harm. He also pleaded guilty to assaulting Sergeant Jackson in the execution of his duty and finally to escaping from lawful custody. In respect of those offences he was sentenced to a total of two years' imprisonment. There is no appeal in regard to those offences. However, on another count, which was in fact count 3 of the indictment, he was convicted of assaulting a Mr. Harlow, thereby occasioning him E actual bodily harm, and in respect of that he was sentenced to a further year consecutive to the two years, the total on the other counts. He now appeals by leave of the court against his conviction and sentence on that count 3.

The short facts were that late in the evening on a day in August, 1967, a Mr. and Mrs. Harlow and a Mr. Bourne were walking along the pavement and coming towards them were four young men, Farrell, Tull, Richards and the appellant, F all walking abreast. According to Mr. Harlow, he let go of his wife's arm and brushed against one of these men who came in between him and his wife. He could not identify the appellant as being that man but he said that that man immediately turned round, struck him with his knee in the groin and also a glancing blow in the face with his fist. He then went on to say that almost immediately one of the four men, and indeed the same man, he thought, as had struck him, G turned and struck Mr. Bourne. Mr. Bourne was struck by a fist on the chin, knocked over and unfortunately hit his head on the pavement, fracturing his skull. As I have said, Mr. Harlow was unable to identify the man who hit him and who hit Mr. Bourne. Mrs. Harlow was again unable to identify the man, although she said that it was the same man in each case. Mr. Farrell and Mr. Tull, H two of the other men, gave evidence, however, that it was the appellant who had hit both Mr. Harlow and Mr. Bourne. The appellant's defence was that in fact the man who had brushed against Mr. Harlow and who had hit Mr. Harlow and hit Mr. Bourne was none other than Mr. Tull himself. Pausing there, there was undoubtedly ample evidence to support the verdict against the appellant in regard to an assault on Mr. Harlow and nobody could complain of an impeccable summing-up and direction on the law in this case. What is said nevertheless is that I that verdict ought not to be allowed to stand because the jury in fact acquitted the appellant on two other counts in regard to the assault on Mr. Bourne. He had been charged with causing grievous bodily harm with intent, and in the alternative, inflicting grievous bodily harm on Mr. Bourne. When the jury came to return their verdicts they did it in this form. Asked in regard to the first count, A “Do you find the accused guilty or not guilty of causing grievous bodily harm with intent?” the answer was, “We find on the first count insufficient evidence so that the [appellant] is not guilty”. Then the second count was put: “Do you find him guilty or not guilty of unlawfully inflicting grievous bodily harm?”

The foreman answered, “On the second count exactly the same; not guilty.”

It is in those circumstances that counsel for the appellant argues that the sole B issue here was one of identity; that all the evidence was that it was the same man, whoever that man was; and that it follows that the jury, having rejected the evidence of Mr. Farrell and Mr. Tull in regard to the offences against Mr. Bourne should have rejected them in regard to the offences against Mr. Harlow. In the course of his argument the court has been referred to a great number of cases dealing with apparently inconsistent verdicts, in some of which the verdict has C been upheld and in others in which it has been quashed. They are, of course, by their very nature cases in which the two counts, being compared and which are said to be inconsistent, are closely linked either on the facts or by reason of motive or in regard to the nature of the defences, but the principle, as it seems to this court, in every case is whether the inconsistency is such that it would not be safe to allow the verdict, which prima facie is entirely a proper verdict, to stand. D
There is a useful passage in regard to the approach that the court should make, which is in a judgment given by DEVLIN, J., in R. v. Stone (1) in this court in 1954.
DEVLIN, J., there said:

“When an appellant seeks to persuade this court as his ground of appeal that the jury has returned a repugnant or inconsistent verdict, the burden is plainly on him. He must satisfy the court that the two verdicts cannot stand together, meaning thereby that no reasonable jury who had applied their mind properly to the facts in the case could have arrived at the conclusion, and once one assumes that they were an unreasonable jury, or that they could not have reasonably come to the conclusion, then the convictions cannot stand. But the burden is on the defence to establish that.”

Applying that approach, this court is by no means satisfied that only an unreason- F able jury could have come to this conclusion or that it would be in any way unsafe to let the verdict stand. With all due respect to counsel for the appellant, the court very much doubts here whether the sole issue was identity because there was a real distinction between the charges made in respect of these two men. So far as Mr. Harlow was concerned, the appellant was only charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm and the jury may well have thought that the proper charge in respect of Mr. Bourne would also have been assault occasioning actual bodily harm—something which was not left to them—and by their verdict were really saying that there was insufficient evidence for them to hold that there had been grievous bodily harm in respect of Mr. Bourne at all. They may further have been influenced by the fact that this appellant, as the result of an accident, had an injured right hand which it was suggested was incapable of hitting Mr. Bourne on the chin with the force necessary to fell him to the ground. H whereas in the case of Mr. Harlow the main blow struck was with the knee and only a glancing blow to the face had been inflicted by a fist. Be that as it may, this court is of the opinion that this verdict can be safely left and accordingly the appeal is dismissed. [His LORDSHIP, having heard argument on the appellant's behalf regarding sentence, stated that the appeal against sentence was dismissed.] I

COROCRAFT, LTD., AND ANOTHER v. PAN AMERICAN AIRWAYS, INC.

Carriage by Air—Carriage of goods—International carriage—Limitation of liability of carriers—Theft by carriers' servant—Air consignment note stating volume or dimension of goods—Proper law of contract United States law—Paramountcy of English Act in action in England—Clause in air consignment note for limitation of liability at same limit as statutory limit—Clause not subject to abrogation in events specified in art. 9 or art. 25 of Sch. 1 to Act of 1932—Whether clause avoided by art. 23—Carriage by Air Act, 1932 (22 & 23 Geo. 5 c. 36), Sch. 1, art. 8, art. 23.

A parcel of jewellery was consigned from America to England via an American airline, but was stolen by one of the carriers' servants before delivery to the consignee. The air consignment note did not give particulars of the volume or dimensions of the goods, although it stated the other information required by art. 8* of Sch. 1 to the Carriage by Air Act, 1932.

D

From this other information it could have been deduced that the volume or dimensions would be between 480 and 720 cubic inches, or ten to twelve inches in length, six inches in width, and eight to ten inches in depth. A clause in the air consignment note purported to limit liability to the value stated for carriage by the shippers on the face of the note, or in the absence of such statement to 250 gold francs or their equivalent per kilogram of goods destroyed, lost, damaged or delayed. The shippers had declared a value for customs but not one for carriage. It was admitted for the purpose of the action that by federal legislation of the United States of America an air waybill need state only one of the matters mentioned in para. (i) of art. 8 (namely, weight, quantity, volume or dimensions), so that the omission of particulars of volume and dimensions would not disentitle carriers to limit liability under United States legislation.

Held: (i) the liability of the carriers was not limited by the clause of the air consignment note purporting to limit liability because the limitation of liability was avoided by art. 23† of Sch. 1 to the Act of 1932 since, although the pecuniary limit fixed in the clause was the same as that laid down by art. 22 (2) of Sch. 1 to the Act of 1932, the limitation of liability by the clause was not subject to abrogation in the events specified in art. 9‡ and art. 25 of Sch. 1 to the Act of 1932, and was therefore a provision which tended to relieve the carriers of liability (see p. 1063, letter H, post).

G

(ii) the carriers were not entitled to limitation of liability by virtue of art. 22 (2) of Sch. 1 to the Act of 1932 for the following reasons—

H

(a) because the volume and dimensions of the parcel could not be taken as being impliedly stated, and thus sufficiently stated to satisfy art. 8 (i) of Sch. 1 to the Act of 1932, since, although some lack of ultimate precision might be permissible, the inferences to be drawn from the information in the air consignment note involved too wide a range of approximation (see p. 1065, letter E, post);

I

(b) because, as the air consignment note did not state either volume or dimensions, it failed to comply with para. (i) of art. 8 of Sch. 1 to the Act of 1932 with the consequence that art. 9 disentitled the carrier to the benefit of limitation of liability under art. 22 (2) (see p. 1072, letters B and G, post).

(c) because, for the purposes of litigation in the English court, the Act of 1932 provided law which was paramount to other rights and liabilities in respect of loss of goods, and thus the fact that the proper law of the contract was that of the United States did not render the terms of the Warsaw Convention, embodied in United States law, the relevant terms for the purposes of the present action (see p. 1065, letter H, and p. 1066, letters F and G, post).

Preliminary Issue.

This was a preliminary issue in an action brought against the carriers, Pan American Airways, Inc., as carriers and/or bailees for reward for damages for failure to deliver to the plaintiffs goods consigned by air. Further, or alternatively, the plaintiffs claimed that the defendants, as bailees and/or carriers for reward, were in breach of their obligations to the plaintiffs in that they negligently failed to take any or any sufficient steps to preserve the said goods from theft, in consequence whereof the goods were stolen from the defendants' customs and clearance office. The carriers sought to limit their liability and the issue was

"Whether the right (if any) of the defendants to exclude or limit their liability as alleged in the amended points of defence and rejoinder is excluded by the alleged omission from the air waybill of particulars of (a) volume, and (b) the dimensions of the goods."

The facts are set out in the judgment.

M. J. Mustill and D. W. Steel for the plaintiffs.

A. H. M. Evans for the defendants.

May 28. DONALDSON, J., read the following judgment: In Brown & Co., Ltd. v. Harrison, Hourani v. Harrison (1), the Court of Appeal held in favour of cargo interests and against carriers by sea that the word "or" in art. IV, r. 2 (g), of the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, must be read as "and". In this case I am asked to redress that balance in favour of cargo interests by holding that the word "and" in para. (i) of art. 8 of Sch. 1 to the Carriage by Air Act, 1932, must be read as "or", thus enabling carriers by air to limit their liability in certain circumstances.

(1) [1927] All E.R. Rep. 195; 137 L.T. 549.

A The matter has arisen in this way. On May 10, 1962, Verité Jewels, Ltd., a United States company, consigned a small parcel of Topaz jewellery by air to the second plaintiffs, Vendome Jewels, Ltd., who carry on business in England at Crawley in Sussex. I do not think that I was told what was the interest of the first plaintiffs, but it is immaterial for present purposes. The jewellery, which was worth £1,194 13s. 8d., was carried to England by Pan American Airways Inc., the defendants. It reached London Airport safely, but before the defendants could effect delivery to the consignees it was stolen by one of their employees. In these circumstances, the defendants do not now seek to contend that they are free of all liability. They do, however, contend that they are entitled to limit their liability to £19 2s. 10d. This is disputed by the plaintiffs on the ground that there has been a breach of the provisions of art. 8, with the consequences

C provided by art. 9, and further or alternatively that the loss was caused by the wilful misconduct of the defendants or their agents or by such default as is equivalent thereto, with the consequences provided by art. 25. In this preliminary issue I am concerned only with the alleged breach of the provisions of art. 8 by the omission from the air consignment note ("air waybill", in the language of the United States) of particulars of the volume or dimensions of

Counsel for the plaintiffs, submits that the purpose of the Act of 1932 was to provide a comprehensive code governing the rights and liabilities of carriers in relation to international carriage by air when sued in this country and that he is not concerned with the terms of the contract of carriage, at least if they are less favourable to the plaintiffs than the provisions of the Act of 1932, or with

E the terms or effect of compulsory legislation in other countries and, in particular, in the United States. No doubt if all the countries of the world not only adhered to the Warsaw Convention, but also took precisely the same view of its effect and incorporated it in their domestic law, all questions of conflict of laws would be eliminated whether one applied the domestic law of the forum or the proper law of the contract of carriage. However that may be, counsel for the plaintiffs

F submitted that the chosen method in the case of the United Kingdom was to make domestic law paramount in the case of all actions tried in the United Kingdom courts, and he referred me to the long title, the preamble and s. 1 of the Act of 1932 and to art. 32.

The general scheme of the convention in relation to the carriage of goods is as follows. Article 1 provides that the convention shall apply to all "international carriage" by air and defines "international carriage". It is agreed that the carriage with which I am concerned was "international carriage". Article 18 provides that the carrier is prima facie liable for loss of or damage to goods if the occurrence which gave rise to such loss or damage took place during the carriage by air. It is conceded that the goods with which I am concerned were lost during the carriage by air as that phrase is defined in art. 18 (2). This prima

H facie liability is displaced if the carrier proves that he and his agents have taken all necessary measures to avoid the damage or that it was impossible for him or them to take such measures. It is conceded that the defendants cannot discharge this burden in this case. However, the defendants, although liable to the plaintiffs, are prima facie entitled to limit their liability to a sum of 250 gold francs per kilogram in accordance with the provisions of art. 22 (2), and

I it is agreed that the sterling equivalent of the sum so calculated is £19 2s. 10d.

It is at this point that art. 8 and art. 9 become relevant. Article 8 provides that "the air consignment shall contain the following particulars", and it then lists a large number of matters in sentences lettered (a) to (q), including:

"(g) the nature of the goods;

"(h) the number of the packages, the method of packing and the particular marks or numbers upon them;

"(i) the weight, the quantity and the volume or dimensions of the goods."

The defendants' form of air consignment note is laid out with columns for "No. of packages" (h), "Method of packing" (h), "Nature and quantity of goods" (g) and (i), "Marks and numbers" (h), "Dimensions or volume" (i), "Gross weight (specify in kilos or lbs)" (i). The letters which I have mentioned do not appear on the form and are cross-references to the relevant sentences of art. 8. This form of air consignment note is presumably in general use since it is prescribed by the International Air Transport Association ("I.A.T.A."). In the present case a form was completed as follows:—(No. of packages) "ONE (1)", (Method of packing) "CARTON", (Nature and quantity of goods) "TOPAZ JRLRY SET IN 14 KT GOLD", (Marks and numbers) "AS ADDR NO. 1", which, being interpreted, means that the carton bore the mark "Vendome Jewels, Fleming Way, Crawley, Sussex, England", and the number "No. 1", (Gross weight) "7 LBS 3.1 KGS". The column headed "Dimensions or volume" was left blank.

If, as is submitted by the plaintiffs, there has in these circumstances been a failure to comply with the provisions of sentence (i) of art. 8, the defendants are prevented from limiting their liability under art. 22, since art. 9 provides that "If the carrier accepts goods without an air consignment note having been made out, or if the air consignment note does not contain all the particulars set out in art. 8 (a) to (i) inclusive and (g), the carrier shall not be entitled to avail himself of the provisions of this convention which exclude or limit his liability."

Article 9 is a curious provision and no-one has been able to give me any rational explanation for the severe sanction which it imposes or for the selection of sentences (a) to (i) and (g) as being of paramount importance. The sentences can be grouped—for example, (a) to (c) and (g) relate to whether the carriage is international. However, (j), in respect of which no sanction applies, clearly falls in the same group as (g) to (i), to which the sanction does apply. I did at one time wonder whether the sanction was in part related to the need to ensure that carriers did not infringe minimum charging agreements, but I should have expected (k) to be included if this were the explanation. The matter becomes the more mysterious when it is appreciated that the obligation to complete an air consignment note rests on the consignor and not on the carrier. (See arts. 5-7.)

The plaintiffs' case has all the attractiveness of extreme simplicity and can be summarised in two sentences. Article 8 requires the consignment note to state, inter alia, three out of four matters, namely the weight, the quantity and either the volume or the dimensions of the goods. As neither the volume nor the dimensions was stated, art. 9 disentitles the defendants from availing themselves of the limitation of liability contained in art. 22 (2). The fact that "the quantity" was not stated is not relied on by the plaintiffs, possibly because no-one could suggest whether any and, if so, what quantity should be stated in relation to goods of this type or whether the proper notation was "None" or "Not applicable".

The defendants put forward a five part answer as follows:

1. The air consignment note complied with the Act of 1932, if that Act is properly construed, despite the presence of the word "and".

2. The air consignment note complied with the Act of 1932 since the word "and" must be rejected having regard to the French text of the convention and to the serious consequences flowing from the plaintiffs' construction.

3. The air consignment note complied with the equivalent United States legislation which applied to the exclusion of the Act of 1932, since the proper law of the contract of carriage was that of the United States of America.

4. The volume and dimensions of the goods were implicitly stated, and this is a sufficient compliance with both the United Kingdom and United States legislation.

- A 5. Even if the defendants cannot rely on the limitation provided by art. 22 (2), they are entitled to rely on cl. 4 in the conditions of contract endorsed on the air consignment note.

The first and second parts of the defendants' submissions are linked and are best considered together. The remaining parts are separate and can more conveniently be considered in the reverse order to that in which they are set out above.

- B Clause 4 of the air consignment note. This clause provides that:

- C "Except as the convention or other applicable law may otherwise require . . . (c) the charges for carriage having been based upon the value declared by the shipper, it is agreed that any liability shall in no event exceed the shipper's declared value for carriage stated on the face hereof, and in the absence of such declaration by shipper, liability of carrier shall not exceed 250 such French francs, [i.e. gold francs as specified in the Convention] or their equivalent per kilogram of goods destroyed, lost, damaged or delayed . . . ."

- D The air consignment note provides two boxes for completion by the inclusion of "Shipper's declared value", the first being headed "For customs" and the second "For carriage". In the present case the declared value for customs was $ (U.S.) 2959.00 and that for carriage "NVD", which stands for "No value declared". Counsel for the defendants draws attention to the fact that by failing to declare a value for carriage purposes, the shippers or the plaintiffs obtained the advantage of a lower freight rate than would otherwise have been applicable and in fact paid only the minimum rate. The force of this comment is somewhat minimised by the fact that the true value, albeit for customs purposes, appears on the face of the air consignment note.

- E The plaintiffs' answer to this point is that this part of cl. 4 is avoided by art. 23 of Act of 1932, the convention and the United States legislation, which provides that:

- F "Any provision tending to relieve the carrier of liability or to fix a lower limit than that which is laid down in this convention shall be null and void, but the nullity of any such provision does not involve the nullity of the whole contract, which shall remain subject to the provisions of this convention."

- G The defendants reply that cl. 4 is unaffected by art. 23 because, as at the time when the contract was made, it did not tend to relieve the carrier of liability or to fix a lower limit than that which is laid down in the convention, but fixed the same limit. The same point was raised but not decided in Samuel Montagu & Co., Ltd. v. Swiss Air Transport Co., Ltd. (2).

- H I have no hesitation whatsoever in rejecting this contention. Clause 4 does tend to relieve the carrier of liability in that it fixes the same limit of liability as that fixed by art. 22 (2), but does not make it subject to abrogation in the events specified in art. 9 and art. 25.

Implied statement of the volume and dimensions of the goods. In this connexion the plaintiffs have made the following formal admissions:

- I 1. The first plaintiffs and Verité Jewels, Ltd., knew the volume and dimensions of the carton at all material times, and the defendants knew the same as soon as the carton was received for carriage.
2. The approximate volume and dimensions of the carton could be inferred from information contained in the air waybill. The approximate dimensions of the carton were ten to twelve inches long; six inches wide; eight to ten inches deep.
3. The omission from the air waybill of the volume and dimensions of the carton did not cause or contribute to the loss.

4. If the air waybill had stated the volume and dimensions (or either of them) of the goods, the defendants could not thereby have been caused to charge a different rate of freight for the goods, or to alter the mode of carriage or custody.

The defendants submit that inasmuch as the approximate dimensions and volume of the carton could be inferred or deduced from the information contained in the air consignment note and in particular from the description of the goods and the weight, the dimensions and volume are impliedly contained in the air consignment note and the requirements of art. 8 are satisfied.

This submission is based on reported English and United States decisions relating to sentences (c) and (q) in art. 8. Thus it has been held by the English Court of Appeal in Samuel Montagu & Co., Ltd. v. Swiss Air Transport Co., Ltd. (3), that the requirement at (q) that the air consignment note shall contain "a statement that the carriage is subject to the rules relating to liability established by this convention" is met if it states that carriage thereunder is subject to those rules "unless such carriage is not 'international carriage' as defined by the convention". The words "unless such carriage", etc., were treated as surplusage, since the air consignment note stated on its face that the carriage was from London to Zurich and such carriage is clearly international carriage within the meaning of the convention. A similar decision had previously been given by the United States Court of Appeals in Seth v. British Overseas Airways Corp. (4), and the Supreme Court refused an order of certiorari.

Acceptance of the defendants' submission would involve a very substantial extension of the scope of these decisions, since much more than a copy of the air consignment note and of the convention is required in order to establish the volume and dimensions. This is not seriously challenged and reliance is therefore placed on Kraus v. K.L.M. (5), American Smelting & Refinery Co. v. Phillipine Air Lines (6), both decisions of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, and on Flying Tiger Line Inc. v. United States (7), a decision of the Court of Claims. All these cases relate to sentence (c), which requires a statement of the agreed stopping places.

In Kraus v. K.L.M. (5) the court held that there was a sufficient compliance with this requirement if the airline timetable, which showed the agreed stopping places, was incorporated by reference. This was, if I may respectfully say so, a sensible decision and completely in line with the reasoning of the judgment in the Seth (4) and Samuel Montagu (3) cases, but it does not assist the defendants in the present case. The American Smelting case (6) serves their purpose rather better. The learned special referee held that it was a general principle of construction with respect to treaties that they be reasonably and liberally construed so as to carry out their obvious purposes, that the authorities were unanimous in showing that the purpose of (c) was to put the passenger or consignee on notice of the international character of the flight and of the applicability of the Warsaw Convention where the place of departure and destination did not themselves indicate such facts and that as the air consignment note showed on its face the international character of the flight, failure to specify the agreed stopping places did not constitute a failure to comply with art. 8. In the Flying Tiger case (7) Justice MADDEN said that he was inclined to agree with the plaintiffs' proposition that as the parties were well aware of the identity of the agreed stopping places, it would have been useless to have inserted them in the air consignment note and the omission should not affect the rights of the parties.

This is a field in which it is most regrettable that there should be any divergence between the approach of the courts of the United States and those of the United Kingdom, or, more accurately, of England and Wales. Nevertheless,

- A I am not wholly convinced of the correctness of this approach to requirement (c) which seems to me to involve the re-writing of art. 8 in a form which may well be more sensible, but is quite different. In any event, different considerations apply to requirement (i), which is not directed to the international character of the carriage. The United States and United Kingdom decisions (other than the American Smelting case (8)) fall into line if, while having reservations as to the dicta in some of these judgments, one accepts the proposition that there is compliance with art. 8 if (a) the particulars are stated expressly, or (b) the air consignment note expressly refers to documents which themselves contain the particulars, or (c) the particulars can be deduced from information appearing on the face of the air consignment note or from documents expressly referred to therein when considered in the light solely of the terms of the convention. This may in truth involve too robust an interpretation of the convention, but it does not suffice to make good the defendants' submission.

- Article 8 calls for particulars of the volume or dimensions of the goods and not for approximations, which are all that could be inferred. No doubt some lack of ultimate precision is quite permissible, but the inferences which could be drawn on the basis of the information contained in the air consignment note, namely the weight and contents, considered only in the light of the text of the convention must involve a very high degree of approximation. If the degree of error is to be narrowed, it would clearly be necessary to have knowledge of jewellery, of the way in which it is likely to be packed and the weight of the packing materials. Even the use of this knowledge is, I suggest, unlikely to produce the requisite degree of precision in the volume or dimensions which could be inferred.
- E The range of volume stated in the formal admission set out above extended from 480 to 720 cubic inches—a fifty per cent. variation—and a parcel ten inches by ten inches by six inches looks and is very different from one twelve inches by eight inches by six inches. In my judgment, this submission fails.

- The relevant legislation is that of the United States of America. The defendants submit that the proper law of the contract of carriage is that of the State of New York and the federal law of the United States applicable under that law. This submission is well founded, the contract having been made in New York between nationals of the United States, for performance beginning in the United States, and there being no indication that the contract has a closer or more real or, indeed, any connexion with any other system of law.

- The defendants go on to submit that accordingly the Act of 1932 has no application, save to the extent that its provisions are impliedly accepted by the contract of the parties, such implied acceptance being determined in accordance with the proper law of the contract. This was referred to in argument as the "implied term" approach.
- G

- The plaintiffs adopt what was described as the "code" approach and submit that in proceedings before an English court the Act of 1932 and that alone determines the rights and liabilities of the parties.
- H

- In my judgment, the true view is that the contract of carriage and all claims based on that contract are to be determined in accordance with its proper law. This law would be relevant to claims based on non-performance or to defences based on frustration, and no doubt many other examples can be found.

- However, in respect of an action brought in the English courts, the legislature I has provided by s. 1 of the Act of 1932 that the provisions of the Warsaw Convention, as set out in Sch. 1 to that Act,

"... shall, so far as they relate to the rights and liabilities of carriers, passengers, consignors, consignees and other persons and subject to the provisions of this section, have the force of law in the United Kingdom..."

and that any liability imposed by art. 17 in respect of the death of a passenger shall be in substitution for any liability of the carrier in respect of such death either under statute or at common law. It will be noticed that the convention, as set out in the schedule, is to have the force of law "in the United Kingdom" and not "as part of the law of the United Kingdom". The latter wording is consistent with an English court determining rights in accordance with foreign law, if that were the proper law of the contract, to the exclusion of the Act of 1932 but the former wording is not. The defendants' submission is also scarcely consistent with art. 28, which ignores the proper law of the contract of carriage and requires the plaintiff to bring his action in the territory of a nation which is a party to the convention and before a court having jurisdiction where the carrier is ordinarily resident, has his principal place of business or has an establishment by which the contract has been made or at the place of destination. This article has been held to override the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 11, which governs the service of proceedings outside the jurisdiction (see Rotterdamsche Bank N.V. v. British Overseas Airways Corpn. (9). If that were not enough, the defendants' submission is, in my judgment, defeated by art. 32. The term "proper law of the contract" means the system of law by which the parties intended the contract to be governed, and it is only if that intention is not expressed and cannot be inferred that resort is had to the system of law with which the transaction has its closest and most real connexion (see DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 8th Edn. r. 127), the latter approach being based on the presumed intention of the parties. Article 32 provides that any clause or special agreement

"... entered into before the damage occurred by which the parties purport to infringe the rules laid down by this convention, whether by deciding the law to be applied, or by altering the rules as to jurisdiction, shall be null and void ...".

If, therefore, the parties have, or are deemed to have, decided that the laws of the State of New York are applicable and if those laws are more favourable to the carrier than is the convention set out in the Act of 1932, their choice of law is rendered null and void and they are thrown back on the convention in the form in which it has the force of law in the United Kingdom.

In a sentence, the Act of 1932 provides a parcel of rights and liabilities which, in relation to actions tried in the English courts, exclude all other rights and liabilities in respect of the death of a passenger and are concurrent with, but paramount to, all other rights and liabilities in respect of loss of or damage to luggage and goods.

Accordingly, I hold that I am not directly concerned with the laws of the State of New York or the federal law of the United States, although these and other laws may require consideration in the context of the true construction of the schedule to the Act of 1932.

The construction of sentence (i) in art. 8. Not unnaturally the parties were not at one as to the matters to which I could properly refer in construing this sentence, but I thought it better, and in accord with the traditions of the commercial court, to admit all the evidence which either party sought to tender, and thereafter to consider the extent to which all or any of it can properly be taken into account. I will follow the same course in this judgment.

The French Text.

The convention was drawn up in French (see art. 36) and there was no official English text, although the language of Sch. 1 to the Act of 1932 accorded with the English translation of the convention which was registered with the League of Nations and printed in that organisation's Treaty Series, vol. 137, at p. 13. This accord is hardly surprising since vol. 137 relates to the year 1933, the year after the passing of the Act of 1932, and there is a footnote recording that the English text, with the exception of the preamble, was translated by His Britannic Majesty's Foreign Office. It is a matter for speculation whether the

A Foreign Office adopted the translation of Parliamentary counsel or vice versa or whether the English translation was a product of their co-operation. The volume sets out the French official text on the left hand pages and the English translation on the right.

B The accuracy of the English translation was impugned by the defendants and I had the advantage of hearing evidence from Maître (or Mr.) Picarda, an advocate of the Court of Appeal of Paris and a member of the English Bar, and from Maître Warat, also an advocate of the Court of Appeal of Paris. Unfortunately, these gentlemen were not agreed either as to the meaning of the French text or as to that of the schedule to the Act of 1932. Their views on the latter were plainly inadmissible, although interesting, and I disregard them for present purposes.

C Maître Picarda had no doubt in examination-in-chief that the French text, "le poids, la quantité, le volume ou les dimensions de la marchandise" produced what he described as a "choice" as opposed to an "accumulation". In other words, it was what was described in argument as "one out of four" as opposed to "three out of four". In cross-examination he was asked to consider, either in English or in French, the phrase "State name, address, date of birth or age" D and to say whether this was one out of four or three out of four. He replied that whereas grammatically it was one out of four, the context might well compel a different construction. He was also referred to sentence (h), which reads in French "Le nombre, le mode d'emballage, les marques particulières ou les numéros des colis". This appears in the schedule to the Act as "the number of the packages, the method of packing and the particular marks or numbers upon E them". Here again he had no doubt that in French this was grammatically one out of four, but he had some difficulty in deciding whether the true construction in its context might not be three out of four.

F Maître Warat had no doubt in examination-in-chief that "le poids, la quantité, le volume ou les dimensions" was an "enumeration", i.e. three out of four, and not an "alternative", i.e., one out of four. Had it been the latter, the sentence would have read "le poids, ou la quantité ou encore les dimensions de la marchandise". He expressed similar views concerning sentence (h). In cross-examination he expressed the view that in French a comma replaced the word "et" and could never replace the word "ou". A reference to other passages in the French text showed, however, that this must be an undue simplification.

G The conclusion which I have reached is that in French, as in English, it is possible to write with a precision which permits of only one possible construction, but that, in the absence of such precision, subject-matter and context carry great weight and, in particular, permit a comma to be construed conjunctively when the strict application of grammatical rules might dictate a disjunctive construction. Similar considerations apply to the word "ou". The interesting H problem of the true nature of an invitation by an airline operator to fly to "London, Brussels, Rome or Paris" and to partake en route of a meal consisting of "corn flakes, egg, tea or coffee"—to take an example explored in evidence—is not difficult of solution, even if it may involve some criticism both of the airline's use of English and of its catering.

United States Law.

I Before the action came on for hearing, the plaintiffs formally admitted (for the purpose of this action only) that:

"By the law of the State of New York (incorporating for this purpose the federal law of the United States of America) an air waybill need only state one of the following, viz. weight, quantity, volume or dimensions. A carrier is entitled to limit his liability notwithstanding the omission of volume and dimensions, if the weight is stated in air waybill and if the freight is calculated on the weight."

The practice of the commercial court has always been to encourage admissions of fact with a view to reducing the cost of litigation and increasing the speed of decision. In most cases the court will not be concerned to inquire whether the facts so admitted accord with reality, but this is not always so. In the present dispute I have to construe a statute expressed to be intended to give effect to a convention for the unification of certain rules relating to international carriage by air. In such circumstances I can see every reason why I might be influenced, and perhaps decisively influenced, by the construction of the convention adopted by the laws of the United States of America, if as is the fact, the point is devoid of authority in English law. On the other hand, what the parties choose to agree as being the law of the United States of America seems to me to be of no assistance whatsoever, unless it has a solid factual foundation.

In the light of these considerations, it was agreed that this admission should be withdrawn and that I should be supplied with an agreed statement of fact, supplemented, if the parties so wished, by evidence. It was eventually agreed that neither party could find any report of a decision by a court in the United States which was directly concerned with sentence (i) of art. 8 or any literature concerning the meaning of this sentence other than PROFESSOR DRON's book, to which I refer hereafter in relation to other systems of law. This negative agreement was supplemented by oral evidence from Mr. Robert Doran, a member of the American Bar who practises in New York and specialises in air law, and by written evidence from Mr. J. Edwin Carey, who is also a member of the American Bar.

Mr. Carey was of opinion that the courts of the United States would construe sentence (i) in the manner suggested by the plaintiffs, namely, as requiring the air waybill to state on its face the weight of the goods, the quantity of the goods and either the volume or dimensions of the goods. Mr. Doran said that he had never before heard it suggested that United States legislation required the statement of three out of four. There are, he said, only a very few lawyers specialising in aviation law and he did not include Mr. Carey amongst their number. He had taken steps to ascertain the consensus of professional opinion amongst these specialists and it was that on the true construction of sentence (i) it was only necessary to state such of the particulars mentioned as were essential or necessary in the circumstances of any particular case in order to identify the cargo and to assess the proper freight charge. Mr. Doran was of the same opinion. He was quite sure that the United States courts would adopt a liberal approach as displayed in the American Smelting case (10). This would involve stating both weight and volume or dimensions in a case in which freight was based on cubic measurements, but not in other cases. It would also, he said, involve taking account of commercial considerations such as the cost and difficulty involved in checking air waybills and returning them to consignors if they were not properly completed. These conditions would have varying weight in different times and circumstances and the courts might thus sometimes require the inclusion of particulars which at others they might hold could be omitted.

I find it impossible to know how the courts of the United States will resolve this problem, if and when it comes before them. I accept that they are unlikely to allow the language of the convention to become "a verbal prison" (per FRANKFURTER, J., in a dissenting judgment in Sullivan v. Behimer (11)). I also accept that they will not be unduly influenced by a liberal approach and will echo the words of JUDGE LEARNED HAND in his address to the Massachusetts Bar Association that:

"words are such temperamental beings that the surest way to lose their essence is to take them at their face."

(10) [1956] U.S. & Can. Av. R. 387.

(11) (1960), 363 U.S. 335 at p. 358.

A The approach of the English courts may appear superficially to be more verbally imprisoned than that of the American courts, but given a common view as to the true construction of any particular words, both courts can usually be relied upon to reach the same conclusion, although by somewhat different routes.

Other systems of law.

I am indebted to a work entitled LIMITATION OF LIABILITIES IN INTERNATIONAL AIR LAW, published in 1954 and written by an international expert in air law, the Dutch PROFESSOR H. DRION, for information on how other systems of law have treated sentence (i) of art. 8 (see para. 269). From this it seems that India (1934), Australia (1935), Eire (1936), Canada (1939), New Zealand (1940), Ceylon (1950) and the Union of South Africa (1946 but not in force in 1954) adopted the English text with the word "and" between "the quantity" and "the volume". The United States (1934) adopted literal translation of the French text of sentence (i), although it adopted the English text of sentence (h) with its added "and". Germany (1933) and Sweden (1937) in their respective languages adopted the same approach as the United States adding an "and" in sentence (h) and adopting a literal translation of the French text in the case of sentence (i). Italy in translating the French text of sentence (i) has substituted "and" for "or", thus apparently producing a "four out of four" situation. The research of counsel also suggested that Brazil, whilst adopting a literal translation of the French text of sentence (i), had adopted a novel approach to sentence (h) by substituting "and" for "or" in the French text, thus making this "four out of four". PROFESSOR DRION, in a footnote, records that the Belgian delegate to an organisation known as CITEJA took the view that sentence (i) is cumulative rather than alternative.

It seems, therefore, that most countries consider that sentence (h) of the French text is properly translated in a form which makes it clear that both the number of the packages and the method of packing must always be specified and that either the particular marks or the numbers on the packages must also be specified. In relation to sentence (i), which has a similar construction in the French text, the English speaking nations, other than the United States of America, have adopted a translation which makes it clear that this sentence is also to be construed as three out of four. The United States and the non-English speaking nations, other than Italy, have adopted a literal translation from the French, thus preserving such ambiguity as may exist. No nation has translated the French text in such a way as to give a clear indication that what is required is one out of four, although Italy has adopted a translation involving four out of four.

Mr. Batson, who has for twenty years been the London manager of the defendants, gave evidence that in the case of ninety-five per cent. of goods carried by air the amount of the air freight depends on their actual weight, subject to minimum charges. In the remaining five per cent. freight is charged on cubic measurement. Whether actual weight or cubic measurement is the determining factor depends on whether the actual weight is or is not greater than a notional weight calculated in the United Kingdom on the basis that a cubic foot is equal to four kgs. In countries using the metric system the conversion factor is 7000 cu. cms. to the kg. Freight is payable on whichever weight is the greater. In Mr. Batson's experience there is no commercial point in recording the dimensions or volume of goods unless they have so large a volume/weight ratio as to be chargeable on a notional rather than an actual weight. Unusual dimensions which may create stowage problems are notified to the operating department specially.

I was also introduced to a formidable volume produced by the International Air Transport Association, entitled MANUAL OF TRAFFIC CONFERENCE RESOLUTIONS. Resolution 600 prescribes the form of air waybill to be used, as it was in this case, and the procedure to be adopted. This procedure seems to involve entering both the weight and either the dimensions or the volume of the goods.

Text Books.

McNAIR'S LAW OF THE AIR (3rd Edn.) lists certain differences between the Carriage by Air Act, 1932, and the equivalent United States legislation (see p. 226, n. 28), but most of these reflect the particular version of the English language in use in the respective countries rather than differences of meaning. The list contains no reference to sentence (i), and indeed the only current edition of a text book to notice and grapple with this point seems to be PROFESSOR DRION'S LIMITATION OF LIABILITIES IN INTERNATIONAL AIR LAW. PROFESSOR DRION expresses his views on sentences (h) and (i) in paras. 268 and 269 as follows:

"The number of the packages, the method of packing, the particular marks or the numbers on the packages. The text is not clear as to whether it is sufficient to have only one of these particulars mentioned, or whether the only choice is between the two last mentioned particulars. The latter solution seems preferable, as the other two items are so entirely different from each other and from the last two items that it would not make sense to say that the information as to the number of packages could be replaced, e.g., by the method of packing. The text of the English Carriage by Air Act and the American government translation have clarified the point by inserting the word 'and' after the words 'method of packing'."

"The same problem arises with respect to 'the weight, the quantity, the volume or the dimensions of the goods', but with this distinction that here all four particulars are of a similar nature, so that there is nothing illogical in providing that it will suffice to fill in only one of the four. Meanwhile, the English text has made the enumeration cumulative also here, by inserting the word 'and' before 'the volume and dimensions', so that at least in England and those countries which have adopted the same text for their legislation, the volume or dimensions of a shipment probably must be mentioned in addition to the number of packages and the quantity."

"The practical result of this interpretation is most unfortunate, as it compels shippers and carriers to much extra work which serves no practical purpose at all. Outside the British Commonwealth the accumulative interpretation does not appear to have been accepted. It is observed that it does not only make the 'volume or dimension' a mandatory requirement, but also the 'quantity' of the goods. Obviously, in a number of cases it is impossible to speak of the quantity of a shipment. What is the quantity of a suitcase containing personal belongings, shipped under an air waybill? And how to describe in any exact way the volume or dimensions of, e.g., a bicycle? Certainly, it should be sufficient if either the weight, or the quantity, or the volume, or the dimensions of the goods are mentioned on the air waybill."

Conclusion.

Counsel for the plaintiffs, submits that the words:

"The air consignment note shall contain the following particulars: ...
(i) the weight, the quantity and the volume or dimensions of the goods"

permit of only one construction, and that it is not therefore permissible to look at the Warsaw Convention or to consider either the legislation of other countries or the practical results of that construction. He further submits that if a court is considering a statutory provision which contained no patent ambiguity, it should not look at other documents with a view to discovering a latent ambiguity and resolving it in the light of those documents. Furthermore, in this case Parliament has deliberately provided by s. 1 (1) not that the Warsaw Convention shall have the force of law in the United Kingdom, but that "the provisions [of the convention] as set out in Sch. 1 to this Act shall ... have the force of law in the United Kingdom ..."

A If and in so far as there is any variance between the schedule and the convention, it was the intention of Parliament to give effect to the schedule.

Counsel for the defendants, submits that the words of s. 1 (1) and the form of the schedule indicate no more than that Parliament believed that the schedule represented a correct translation of the convention. The paramount object of the Act of 1932, as declared in the long title and the preamble, was to give effect to the convention and the schedule should receive a construction which will achieve this object. Furthermore, he submits, the literal meaning of the words of a statute must be rejected if that meaning leads to results which are absurd, confusing or inconsistent.

The duty of the courts is to ascertain and give effect to the will of Parliament as expressed in its enactments. In the performance of this duty the judges do not act as computers into which are fed the statute and the rules for the construction of statutes and from whom issues forth the mathematically correct answer. The interpretation of statutes is a craft as much as a science and the judges, as craftsmen, select and apply the appropriate rules as the tools of their trade. They are not legislators, but finishers, refiners and polishers of legislation which comes to them in a state requiring varying degrees of further processing.

D All this is familiar to English lawyers. I mention it because the problem with which I am concerned in this case is likely to be of interest to aviation lawyers on the other side of the Atlantic and I should be sorry if they thought, as I think that Mr. Doran thought, that the English judicial process was such that the judges inhabited FRANKFURTER, J.'s verbal prison, happily unaware of the risks involved in a literal interpretation of JUDGE LEARNED HAND's "temperamental beings". Not so. If the English courts might hesitate to adopt so robust an approach as did the learned special referee in the American Smelting case (12), it is not because these courts are less aware of the needs of the commercial community, but rather, perhaps, that there is a difference of opinion between the courts on the two sides of the Atlantic in their evaluation of the commercial advantages of certainty derived from close attention to the words of the statute.

F A relevant factor may also be differences in the legislative process. In the United Kingdom treaties do not become part of the domestic law by proclamation, but only by enactment after Parliamentary debate, and with the possibility of clarification and amendment. Less therefore may remain to be done by the courts of the United Kingdom by way of interpretation.

G In the English language the conjunctions "or" and "and" are almost inherently ambiguous, and the process of judicial clarification has been applied to statutes as old as Disabled Soldiers [Act.] 1601, and the Bankrupts [Act.] 1603-04 (see MAXWELL ON INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES (11th Edn.), p. 229). There is little difficulty, therefore, in appreciating the possibility of ambiguity in art. 8 (i) and looking further than the words themselves. There is ample authority for looking at the convention to which it is the expressed intention of Parliament to give effect (see, for example, Salomon v. Comrs. of Customs and Excise (13)). There is also authority for the proposition that

"... the judicial interpreter may deal with careless and inaccurate words and phrases in the same spirit as a critic deals with an obscure or corrupt text, when satisfied, on solid grounds, from the context or history of the enactment, or from the injustice, inconvenience or absurdity of the consequences to which it would lead, that the language thus treated does not really express the intention and that his amendment probably does"

(see Swan v. Pure Ice Co., Ltd. per ROMER, L.J. (14), and Re Lockwood (decd.), Atherton v. Brooke (15), in which eight words were excised from a statute).

How then shall I interpret sentence (i) of art. 8? The importance of international comity in the context of aviation legislation needs no emphasis, and, indeed, the whole purpose of the Warsaw Convention was the achievement of just this result. Unfortunately, it is clear that the French text of both sentences (h) and (i) contains an ambiguity. In the case of sentence (h) it has been resolved by almost universal agreement in favour of a conjunctive approach, although it may some time become necessary to consider whether, if goods are adorned with both marks and numbers, the word "or" is to be construed conjunctively. In the case of sentence (i) Parliament appears to have resolved the ambiguity in the same way. In this approach the United Kingdom Parliament has been followed by those of the Commonwealth countries.

The defendants' original contention was that art. 8 conferred an unfettered choice between the inclusion of particulars of the weight or the quantity or the volume or the dimensions of the goods. This is an unlikely construction because of the importance of weight in carriage by air. Furthermore, art. 8 is in part directed to informing the consignor and consignee of the applicability of the convention and of their rights thereunder, and weight is a critical factor in the determination of the limit of the carrier's liability when there has been no special declaration of value. If the defendants are right, particulars of weight could always be omitted. Quantity and either volume or dimensions are of importance in identification and volume or dimensions are also essential in the minority of cases in which freight is calculated on a cubic basis. Yet if the defendants were right, particulars of volume and dimensions could always be omitted.

These considerations no doubt explain the change of approach by the defendants in the course of the hearing, who ultimately contended that the sentence was to be construed as requiring particulars of weight, quantity and either volume or dimensions, so far as may be "relevant", meaning thereby "useful" or "necessary", in any particular case.

It may well be that the powers who joined in the execution of the Warsaw Convention would have been better advised to have made provision along the lines for which the defendants now contend, although consideration would have had to have been given to whether the inherent uncertainty in what was required in any particular case was commercially desirable, but they did not do so. In my judgment, it is not for a court, or indeed any single legislature, to vary the convention, and I am not prepared to do so under the guise of interpretation.

For these reasons which I have sought to express, I hold that the air consignment note did not comply with art. 8 (i), with the consequences provided by art. 9.

E The plaintiff company had liquid assets including a credit for some
F £232,500 with a bank. C. Ltd., a banking company concerned in take-over bids, acting on behalf of an undisclosed principal who was C., bid for the share capital of the plaintiff company, and the offer was accepted by holders of seventy-nine per cent. of the plaintiff company's share capital. The cost of this acquisition was about £195,000. C. had an account with a branch of the D. bank which was in negligible credit. At C.'s instance
G the D. bank branch accepted a transfer of the plaintiff company's account from N. bank, and pursuant to a resolution of the board of the plaintiff company (i.e., the newly constituted board after the take-over, who were C. Ltd.'s nominees) the plaintiff company gave a mandate to the D. bank authorising the account to be operated by cheques signed by two directors. On Apr. 25, 1958, a banker's draft for £195,000 on D. bank was given to
H C. Ltd., the amount being debited by arrangement between C. and the D. bank to C.'s account. C.'s account was enabled to meet this by crediting a cheque for £232,500 drawn by the plaintiff company in favour of W. Ltd. (a private investment company) and endorsed on behalf of W. Ltd. to C. The £232,500 so paid by the plaintiff company represented a loan to W. Ltd. at interest, and the further transfer to C. represented a loan by W. Ltd. to C. at slightly greater interest. C. Ltd., out of the £195,000, paid the assenting shareholders of the plaintiff company whose shares* were acquired
I on the take-over. Thus the credit balance of the plaintiff company at the N. bank was ultimately applied as to some £195,000 in paying for the acquisition of some seventy-nine per cent. of the plaintiff company's shares, which were acquired on behalf of C. and became registered in the name of D. bank's nominee company as nominee for C. There was no evidence to show that any properties or assets were transferred or were immediately to be transferred to the plaintiff company, and the application of the plaintiff company's credit balance in the manner previously indicated was, so the court found*, a dishonest misapplication. The plaintiff company claimed (a) against two directors of the newly constituted board of the plaintiff company to account as trustees for misapplication of the £232,500; (b) against C. Ltd. as constructive trustee to replace £195,000 in the plaintiff company's funds; and (c) against the D. bank as constructive trustee to reimburse the plaintiff company the £232,500 paid to W. Ltd. on the ground that D. bank ought to have known (not ought to have made enquiry) that the payment of the £232,500 would be a misapplication, and alternatively against the D. bank for damages in contract for negligence in paying the cheque to W. Ltd. endorsed to C. The plaintiff company also claimed against W. Ltd. as constructive trustee in respect of the £232,500, but W. Ltd. did not dispute the equitable obligation, raising only defences on the basis of novation, satisfaction and illegality.

In regard to claim (a). The plaintiff company's cheque in favour of W. Ltd. for £232,500 was signed by two directors of the plaintiff company, the defendants B.-L. and J. Both these directors were nominees under C.'s control. Neither director made any enquiry about the purpose of the loan to W. Ltd., but voted for the board's resolutions to transfer the plaintiff company's account to D. bank and to lend W. Ltd. the £232,500, because C. wanted that. C. himself was not a director of the plaintiff company.

In regard to claim (b). No enquiry was made on C. Ltd.'s behalf whether or when assets were to be transferred to or "injected into" the plaintiff company at the times when C. paid C. Ltd. the £195,000 and C. Ltd. paid off the assenting shareholders of the plaintiff company. The board of the plaintiff company at that time consisted of C. Ltd.'s nominees, one of whom was B.-L. who became a nominee director for C., when C. took over the plaintiff company from C. Ltd. On this and other evidence the court found † that C. Ltd. knew that the plaintiff company's moneys were being used and misapplied to provide the £195,000 paid to C. Ltd.

In regard to claim (c). The plaintiff company's claim in equity against D. bank depended on the question whether D. bank should have known, from the facts apparent to its branch officials, that the plaintiff company's £232,500 was being used in part to cover the purchase by C. of shares in the plaintiff company. On receiving the cheque for £232,500 in favour of W. Ltd. and endorsed to C., the manager of the branch of D. bank had been much concerned about the validity of the endorsement (having regard to the bank's instructions concerning endorsed cheques). Considering all the material available to the branch officials by Apr. 25, 1958, the court found ‡ that a reasonable banker would have concluded that the payment was to finance purchase by C. of shares of the plaintiff company.

Held: (i) (in regard to the director defendants, claim (a) above) the director defendants, B.-L. and J., were liable in equity to account as trustees to the plaintiff company for the £232,500 for the following reasons—

(a) moneys standing to the credit of a company's bank account which directors had authority to operate were moneys of which the directors were trustees for the company in accordance with its purposes (see p. 1094, letter E, post).

- F (b) the £195,000 received by C. Ltd. from C. represented moneys of the plaintiff company for the purposes of a claim by it in equity against C. - G C. Ltd. knew that there was no contemporaneous or immediate transfer of assets by C. to the plaintiff company and that the plaintiff company's moneys were being used to provide the £195,000, C. (b) moreover the existence of a mandate from a company by which cheques were signed as so authorised were to be valid and binding on the company customer did not enable the bank to rely on the signatures as conclusive, so as to exclude the obligation of the bank to the company to exercise care and skill in relation to the cheque (see p. 1119, letter E, post).

Midland Bank, Ltd. v. Reckitt ([1932] All E.R. Rep. 90) applied.

(c) on the facts in the present case a reasonable banker would have concluded on Apr. 25, 1958, that the payment of £232,500 out of the plaintiff company's account was to finance the purchase by C. of shares of the plaintiff company, and, though the officials of the branch office of the D. bank had not realised this, the bank could not escape liability on that ground, particularly in view of the absence of instructions to its officials regarding take-over transactions (see p. 1137, letter I, and p. 1138, letter B, post); accordingly, by reason of the knowledge of the D. bank of relevant facts, the bank was liable as constructive trustee to replace so much of the £232,500 paid out of the plaintiff company's account as had been misapplied.

(d) the D. bank were also liable to the plaintiff company in contract for failure to exercise reasonable care and skill in paying the cheque for £232,500 without making enquiry of the directors of the plaintiff company as to the purpose for which the £232,500 was being applied (see p. 1138, letters F and I, post).

(iv) (in regard to the claim against W. Ltd.) (a) the loan of £232,500 by the plaintiff company to W. Ltd. was unlawful and was avoided by s. 54* of the Companies Act, 1948, but this did not defeat the plaintiff company's claims (see p. 1154, letter H, post).

A second transaction related to the acquisition of C.'s shares in the plaintiff company by B. At a board meeting of the directors of the plaintiff company on Jan. 26, 1960, it was resolved that indebtedness of W. Ltd. on the £232,500 loan from the plaintiff company, and certain indebtedness of other companies should be taken over as to £207,500 by C. and as to £42,000 by another company, but this latter arrangement was not completed and ultimately C. took over the £42,000 indebtedness. A cheque for £207,500 was drawn by C. on his account with the N.S. bank for crediting to the plaintiff company's account with that bank. The plaintiff company had in fact had an account with that bank since August, 1958, when it was transferred from

A the D. bank. On Jan. 26, 1960, the defendant B. and the defendant S. were appointed directors in place of two who resigned. On the following day the plaintiff company opened an account with the N.S. bank (although the plaintiff company already had an account with that bank) and gave a mandate for its operation. B. and S. signed a cheque for £207,500 on the plaintiff company's account with N.S. bank; this was in favour of B., who
B also had an account with the N.S. bank. B. signed a cheque for £207,500 on his account with that bank in favour of C. These three cheques were taken to the bank by a solicitor who represented to the bank's official that the transactions were for reasons of internal accounting; the N.S. bank official accepted the explanation and credited and debited the cheques accordingly. None of the circle of three cheques could have been met apart
C from the others; but as a result of them B. obtained C.'s shares in the plaintiff company. On Feb. 25, 1960, a circle of three cheques for the £42,000 was similarly debited and credited. S. was throughout these transactions under the control of B., and as director of the plaintiff company, acted as B. told him. The plaintiff company claimed against B. and S. as directors, alleging liability to account as trustees, and against the N.S. bank on an alleged constructive trust for failure to make enquiry, alternatively
D in contract for lack of reasonable care by failing to make enquiry.

Held: (i) in principle B. was liable in equity as trustee to account to the plaintiff company for the £207,500 and the £42,000, and, although the payment by the plaintiff company to B. was unlawful and avoided by s. 54* of the Companies Act, 1948, yet that did not invalidate the plaintiff company's claim against B. as trustee (see p. 1140, letter I, post); S. was similarly liable, and neither B. nor S. was entitled to relief under s. 448† of the Companies Act (see p. 1141, letters F and I, and p. 1155, letter E, post): but, since no effective payment was made in the second transaction, the plaintiff company suffered no loss by its participation therein and this was fatal to its claim (see p. 1148, letter I, post).

F Stein v. Law ([1963] 3 All E.R. 770) applied, and dicta of ROXBURGH, J., in Victor Battery Co., Ltd. v. Curry's Ltd. ([1946] 1 All E.R. 519) not followed on the point that the plaintiff company's claims based on constructive trusteeship were not invalidated.

(ii) the explanation given by the solicitor to the official of the N.S. bank was justifiably assumed to be honest, and the N.S. bank was not, on the evidence, put on enquiry in respect of the cheques for £207,500 and £42,000; accordingly the N.S. bank were not liable in equity as constructive trustees nor were they liable in negligence for alleged failure to make enquiry (see G p. 1145, letter C, post; cf., p. 1104, letter G, and p. 1118, letter H, post).

(iii) the circular payments by each of the two sets of three cheques mentioned above did not result in satisfaction of the indebtedness of W. Ltd. on the loan of £232,500 to it by the plaintiff company, notwithstanding that the credit of each cheque may have amounted to payment of the sum credited, because each time what was received was paid out as part of the arrangement by which the payment in was made, leaving the plaintiff company with the satisfaction only of having played the part of a conduit pipe (see p. 1147, letter I, and p. 1148, letter G, post).

I (iv) in the second transaction (summarised at p. 1076, letter I, ante), the novation that occurred did not extend to any claim by the plaintiff company against W. Ltd. as constructive trustee (see p. 1147, letter A, post).

Action.

This was an action commenced by writ issued on Apr. 21, 1964, and amended on Jan. 15, 1965, and re-amended on Jan. 16, 1968, by the plaintiff company, the Selangor United Rubber Estates, Ltd., a company in compulsory liquidation by order of the court dated June 5, 1961. The action was brought in the name of the company by the Board of Trade pursuant to s. 169 (4) of the Companies Act, 1948, by and with the authority of the official receiver as the liquidator. By the re-amended statement of claim, the plaintiff company claimed as follows: (i) A declaration that the first nine defendants were jointly and severally liable to replace moneys of the plaintiff company misapplied as alleged in the statement of claim, and (a) as to the first, seventh, eighth and ninth defendants to the extent of the sum of £249,500; (b) as to the second defendant to the extent of the sum of £195,322 5s. 2d.; (c) as to the third, fourth, fifth and sixth defendants to the extent of the sum of £232,500 — which said sums of £195,322 5s. 2d. and £232,500 were included in the said sum of £249,500. (ii) An order on the first nine defendants and each of them to pay to the official receiver in companies' liquidation as liquidator of the plaintiff company such sum or sums as the defendants or any one or more of them should be declared liable to replace as aforesaid with interest thereon at the rate of five per cent. per annum. (iii) Against each of the first nine defendants damages for breach of duty. (iv) Further or in the alternative, against the third and seventh defendants damages for negligence. (v) An order on the first nine defendants jointly and severally to pay to the Board of Trade, or alternatively to the official receiver as aforesaid the amount of the expenses of and incidental to an investigation of the affairs of the plaintiff company defrayed by the board.

The defendants were first, Francis Richard Cradock (a bankrupt), second, Contanglo Banking & Trading Co., Ltd., third, District Bank, Ltd., fourth, Woodstock Trust, Ltd., fifth, Francis Evelyn Barlow-Lawson, sixth, Francis Arthur Jacob, seventh, the Bank of Nova Scotia, eighth, John Leonard Burden,

A ninth, William Vernor Squire Sinclair, and tenth, the trustee of the property of Francis Richard Cradock (a bankrupt). Previous proceedings are reported at [1967] 2 All E.R. 1255 and [1968] 1 All E.R. 567.

The cases noted below* were cited during the argument.

B Arthur Bagnall, Q.C., J. P. Warner, Richard Sykes and R. A. Morrill for the plaintiff company.

A. J. Balcombe for the second defendant.

R. H. W. Dunn, Q.C., and K. B. Suenson-Taylor for the third defendants.

G. B. H. Dillon, Q.C., and D. J. Nicholls for the fourth defendants.

John L. Arnold, Q.C., and R. B. S. Instone for the seventh defendants.

The fifth, sixth, eighth and ninth defendants appeared in person.

C The first and tenth defendants did not appear and were not represented.

INTRODUCTION

This action arises from the collapse of a group of companies, including the plaintiff company, and the investigation of the plaintiff company's affairs by inspectors of the Board of Trade. The Board of Trade has brought the action in the name of the plaintiff company under its statutory power conferred by s. 169 (4) of the Companies Act, 1948, now replaced by s. 37 of the Companies Act 1967. In addition, the action is brought with the authority of the liquidator of the plaintiff company, who would be the proper person to bring these proceedings apart from the statutory authority.

The claim and the defendants.

The claims are in respect of substantial funds of the plaintiff company used for purchasing stock in the plaintiff company and in respect of a lesser amount used otherwise than for the purposes of the plaintiff company. All these sums have been lost to the plaintiff company. The claims are in respect of two separate transactions: the first transaction in 1958 and the second transaction in 1960. The first transaction is the basis of a claim in respect of £232,500 transferred from the plaintiff company to the first defendant Mr. Cradock for the purchase of the stock in the plaintiff company. The second transaction is the basis of a claim in respect of first, £207,500 transferred to the eighth defendant, Mr. Burden, for the purchase of the stock in the plaintiff company, and, secondly, a claim in respect of £42,000 transferred to the eighth defendant, Mr. Burden, otherwise than for the purposes of the plaintiff company. The claim in respect of these three sums is not cumulative but is in respect of an overall amount of £249,500 (namely, the £207,500 plus the £42,000) including (that is, in the £249,500) the £232,500.

The first defendant, Mr. Cradock, is at the centre of both transactions and the claim against him is in respect of both the £232,500 and the £249,500. The claims against the rest of the first nine defendants are in respect of the £232,500 or the £249,500 but not both, except that the claim against the second defendant, Contanglo Banking and Trading Co., Ltd. ("Contanglo") is limited to £195,000 which is that part of the £232,500 which came into its hands. The claims in respect of the £232,500, based on the first transaction, are made against the third, to sixth defendants, District Bank, Ltd. ("District"), Woodstock Trust, Ltd. ("Woodstock"), Mr. Barlow-Lawson and Mr. Jacob and, as I have said, in respect of £195,000, part of the £232,500, against the second defendant, Contanglo. The claims in respect of the £249,500 are made against the seventh to ninth defendants, the Bank of Nova Scotia, Mr. Burden and Mr. Sinclair.

Mr. Cradock was a dealer in some kinds of surplus war stores and in properties, and he operated through companies, private and public, which he controlled. In the first transaction he purchased approximately seventy-nine per cent. of stock in the plaintiff company and in the second transaction he disposed of it to Mr. Burden. He was adjudicated bankrupt on Jan. 16, 1967, and the official receiver is his trustee in bankruptcy. Mr. Cradock is out of the country; he entered an appearance but there is before me a motion for judgment against him

A in default of defence. Mr. Cradock's trustee in bankruptcy was added by amendment as tenth defendant with a view to his being bound by any order that may be made. Of the rest of the first nine defendants the personal defendants have appeared in person and the others have been represented by counsel.

B Contanglo carried on business as a banker and was concerned in take-over bids and acted for Mr. Cradock in the first transaction. District were bankers to the plaintiff company for a time during the first transaction and the Bank of Nova Scotia were bankers to the plaintiff company for a time during the second transaction. Woodstock was a private investment company which received a cheque for the £232,500 from the plaintiff company, which it claims was as loan at interest; and it endorsed the cheque over to Mr. Cradock which it claims was as a loan at one per cent. higher rate of interest.

C The individual defendants, Mr. Barlow-Lawson, Mr. Jacob, Mr. Burden and Mr. Sinclair were directors of the plaintiff company: Mr. Barlow-Lawson as chairman from Apr. 24, 1958, to Oct. 7, 1959 (a date in respect of which there was some doubt but to which all parties agreed); Mr. Jacob from Apr. 25, 1958, to Jan. 26, 1960; Mr. Burden and Mr. Sinclair from Jan. 26, 1960, to June 1, 1960, at the earliest, Mr. Sinclair being also chairman. Mr. Barlow-Lawson had D a small engineering business and was introduced by Mr. Scott, a director of Contanglo, into these affairs. Mr. Jacob was an employee of Mr. Cradock, Mr. Burden was developing and expanding a group of engineering businesses and in the second transaction, as I have said, acquired Mr. Cradock's holding of seventy-nine per cent. of stock in the plaintiff company. Mr. Sinclair was in concert with Mr. Burden.

E The legal formulation of the claim against the defendants is against the directors to account as trustees, and against the rest of the first nine defendants to account as constructive trustees, in respect of the misapplication of the plaintiff company's moneys; and, in addition, against the defendant banks for negligence. The claim is against the directors, Mr. Barlow-Lawson and Mr. Jacob (in respect of the £232,500), Mr. Burden and Mr. Sinclair (in respect of F the £249,500), that they are liable to account as trustees for misapplying the plaintiff company's moneys as I have already indicated; against Mr. Cradock (in respect of the £232,500 and £249,500), Contanglo (in respect of the £195,000), District and Woodstock (in respect of £232,500) and the Bank of Nova Scotia (in respect of the £249,500) that they are liable to account as constructive trustees; against Mr. Cradock and Contanglo and Woodstock on the ground that they G knowingly participated in misapplication of the plaintiff company's moneys in breach of trust and received, in the case of Mr. Cradock and Woodstock, £232,500, and, in the case of Contanglo, £195,000 of such moneys; against District on the ground that it likewise knowingly participated in misapplication of £232,500 of the plaintiff company's moneys in breach of trust, or alternatively that it paid away £232,500 of such moneys, knowing them to be trust moneys and when it H knew or ought to have known that such payment was a misapplication; and against the Bank of Nova Scotia on the ground that it paid away £249,500 of the plaintiff company's moneys knowing them to be trust moneys when it ought to have known (though not when it knew) that such payment was a misapplication; and in addition against the banks in negligence in breach of their duty to the plaintiff company as their customer in making such payments out of the I plaintiff company's account with them.

It was submitted that the only misapplication relied on in the statement of claim was the use of the plaintiff company's money to buy its own shares. The statement of claim, however, alleges misapplication of the plaintiff company's money not for the purposes or benefit of the plaintiff company but for the purposes and benefit of named recipients and alternatively, in providing financial assistance for the purchase of shares in the plaintiff company by reason of which the plaintiff company lost £249,500. Thus the pleadings are not, in my view, so limited. The plaintiff company in opening limited the misapplication relied on in respect of the £232,500 and £207,500 to financial assistance for the purchase of shares in the plaintiff company; but this left standing the allegations that such misapplication was not for the purposes or benefit of the plaintiff company but of the recipients by reason of which the plaintiff company lost the money.

These claims are disputed on facts and on law and the questions that thus arise on law are of considerable general importance, particularly for banks.

It would be convenient first to describe the first and second transactions so far as they are not substantially in dispute or there is no difficulty in deciding that the facts are as described. I will then specify the various legal issues which arise and deal with those of them which it will be convenient to deal with at that stage. I will then consider the claim against and the defence of each defendant separately; and in doing so examine the disputes of fact and state the results from my findings of fact, taken in conjunction with my conclusions on the points of law already considered but subject to consideration of outstanding questions of law, which will be more conveniently dealt with afterwards. I will then deal with those outstanding questions of law. Finally, I will state the overall result but leave for consideration later the form of order, costs and a claim for expenses of the investigation by the Board of Trade.

THE FIRST TRANSACTION

I will first indicate the gist of the first transaction and then trace it in some detail.

The gist of the first transaction.

The plaintiff company in 1957-58 was a company without a business but with substantial liquid assets of about £235,800. Contanglo, acting for an undisclosed principal, who was Mr. Cradock, made an offer for the stock in the plaintiff company and the offer was accepted by about seventy-nine per cent. of the stockholders. The total amount payable for the stock and expenses was about £195,000. Mr. Cradock had a bank account at District's Oxford Street branch in negligible credit and it was arranged that the plaintiff company's £232,500 credit in its bank account with National Bank, Ltd. ("National") should be transferred to a new account in the plaintiff company's name at the same branch of District. At a meeting on Apr. 25, 1958, a banker's draft for the £195,000 on District in favour of Contanglo was transferred to Contanglo. In accordance with an arrangement between Mr. Cradock and District, it was to be debited to his account with District, such payment to be covered by a National draft for £232,500 to be paid into Mr. Cradock's account. What happened at the meeting, however, was that, instead of a draft for £232,500 by National for payment into Mr. Cradock's account, National transferred to District's representative two drafts for a total of £232,764 drawn by it in favour of District to be paid into the plaintiff company's new account with District. In accordance with a resolution of the plaintiff company's board to lend £232,500 to Woodstock at eight per cent. interest, a cheque for £232,500 was drawn on the plaintiff company's new account with District in favour of Woodstock; and in accordance with an arrangement that Woodstock should lend that amount at nine per cent. interest to Mr. Cradock, the cheque was endorsed by Woodstock in favour of Mr. Cradock, handed to District's representative and paid into Mr. Cradock's account with District. The £232,500 thus covered the payment of the £195,000 to Contanglo and the seventy-nine per cent. of the stock in the plaintiff company, brought by Contanglo for Mr. Cradock, was in due course registered in one of District Bank's nominee companies as nominee for Mr. Cradock. Thus, Mr. Cradock obtained the stock, Contanglo the £195,000 paid for the stock and expenses and its own fee, Woodstock a liability for £232,500 from Mr. Cradock at one per cent. higher rate of interest than its liability for that amount to the plaintiff company; and the plaintiff company, instead of £232,500 cash, obtained an unsecured liability on the part of Woodstock for that amount at eight per cent. interest.

A The first transaction in detail.

The plaintiff company was incorporated as long ago as 1911 and carried on business as a rubber company in the Malay States. In 1957, like other rubber companies there, it sold its rubber estates with the result that it had over £½ million in cash and investments. There was demand for such companies at this time, companies known as shell companies which had lost all their assets, or preferably which had assets which were all liquid and also had a quotation on the Stock Exchange. Such a company provides a cheap method of obtaining a public company, without need for a prospectus, or for the consent of the Capital Issues Committee under the Control of Borrowing Order, as required for the issue of new shares. Though its Stock Exchange quotation would be suspended on a take-over, it would be regranted when the company acquired business assets and provided the Stock Exchange with particulars of them. Control of such a company had the advantage, for a property dealer, of enabling him to obtain free of tax a profit on a property deal, by selling his properties at substantially less than their market value to the company and then ensuring their resale by the company at market value and taking profits on the re-sale in the form of appreciation in the shares which he then sold. Owing to these advantages, the price for the shares in a shell company exceeded the net asset value of the company's assets and this was represented, in the purchase by Mr. Cradock of stock in the plaintiff company, by a premium of £9,250 in excess of the net asset value. In order to keep the Stock Exchange quotation, however, it was necessary for there to be a substantial minority holding in the company, as happened in the acquisition of the majority shareholding by Mr. Cradock in the plaintiff company. Shareholders who did not accept the take-over offer also shared the advantage of any appreciation in the value of the shares as the result of any re-sale of properties thus sold to (or, to use the jargon, "injected into") the company. Thus the property dealer and shareholders, whether they accepted or rejected the take-over offer, would obtain advantages; and the Revenue would not obtain any tax which, apart from the operation, the property dealer would, in the ordinary course, like others, have to pay on the profits of his business.

Although, in order to obtain the tax advantage, it was of the very essence and purpose of such an operation that the price for the injected properties on sale to the company should be substantially less than the price obtainable on the market, this was apparently treated generally as free from objection. I am not concerned in this case with any objection on such a ground.

If, however, the shell company's liquid assets were used not to pay for properties sold to the company, but to pay for the controlling shareholding, which the taker-over bought, this would clearly be a blatant and fraudulent misapplication of the moneys of such a company as the plaintiff company. That is what the plaintiff company says the first transaction was. The danger, in general, of such a misapplication was clearly recognised by those who were versed in such operations. I shall deal with this in detail, together with the suggested refinements of the shaded area between clear honesty and black dishonesty, when I consider the first case which calls for such a detailed consideration namely, the case against Contanglo.

Mr. Scott of Contanglo proposed to Mr. Cradock that he should acquire the stock in the plaintiff company. On Oct. 16, 1957, acting on behalf of Mr. Cradock a principal whose identity was not disclosed, Contanglo approached the plaintiff company, with the result that on Mar. 31, 1958, Contanglo wrote to the plaintiff company's directors offering, on behalf of unidentified clients (in fact Mr. Cradock), to purchase the whole of the issued stock of the plaintiff, namely, £90,000 of stock at 5s.1½d. per 2s. unit of stock, conditional on acceptance in respect of not less than seventy-five per cent. of the issue capital, the offer to remain open for acceptance by stockholders until Apr. 21 or such extended period as Contanglo might approve, being not later than Apr. 28. There was provision for payment of a total of £550 to the directors of the plaintiff company, Mr. Roberts and Mr. Fenton, as compensation for loss of office, and for the replacement of such directors by Contanglo's nominees on the offer becoming unconditional. The offer of 5s. 1½d. per 2s. stock unit represented the premium of £9,250 in addition to the value of the plaintiff company's assets; and the £235,000 was to cover the purchase of possibly the whole of the stock. Contanglo gave, as references for their readiness and ability to implement the offer, their solicitors, Messrs. D. B. Levinson & Co., and the National Bank.

On the same date as Contanglo thus wrote to the plaintiff company, namely, Mar. 31, Mr. Cradock wrote to Contanglo confirming that their offer to the plaintiff company was made for him as undisclosed principal; that if the offer became effective Contanglo would pay for all acceptances; that the shares would be transferred into the names of Contanglo or their nominees; that all such payments, together with expenses, would be provided as loan from Contanglo to Mr. Cradock at eight per cent. interest; that Mr. Cradock would repay the loan at the expiration of seven days after the closing date of the offer; that Mr. Cradock would pay Contanglo £7,500 if the offer became effective and £500 if not effective; that Mr. Cradock charged, by way of first charge, as security for such payments to Contanglo, the shares of all assenting shareholders; and that he would confer with Contanglo as to the constitution of the new board of the plaintiff company but, in the event, from the resignation of the old board until Mr. Cradock had paid all moneys payable to Contanglo under their agreement, the plaintiff company board was constituted of Contanglo's nominees.

The consensus of opinion about Mr. Levinson, of Contanglo's solicitors D. B. Levinson & Co., is that he was a man of very considerable ability and force of character. He, with Mr. Scott and one Essex, had acquired a fifty per cent. shareholding in Contanglo, though both Mr. Scott and Mr. Levinson preferred not to be on the board. Mr. Scott said that he was in control of the operation and in charge of policy matters for Contanglo in the first transaction and that Mr. Levinson was responsible for implementing that policy.

Contanglo arranged with the Whitehall branch of the National Bank to grant it an overdraft for the £235,000 on Mr. Levinson's guarantee, supported by securities which he had deposited with the bank. However, Contanglo also had a first charge on the stock units in the plaintiff company, purchased for Mr. Cradock, for moneys payable by Mr. Cradock under his agreement with Contanglo, and these were to be in the name of National Bank Nominees. Mr. Snell, the branch manager of National, wrote, also on Mar. 31, to Guthrie & Co., Ltd., the plaintiff company's secretaries, that Contanglo was in a position to provide £235,000 for the purchase of the holdings in the plaintiff company and added that it had been agreed that the "shares" so purchased should be transferred into a National nominee company and indicated that the transfers should be worded accordingly. Again, however, the event differed from the arrangement, for, as we shall see, Contanglo was paid District's draft for the £195,000 covering payments to accepting shareholders (as well as Contanglo's fee and expenses) before any cheques went to accepting shareholders were or, indeed, could be presented for payment.

On Apr. 1 the plaintiff company's board resolved to recommend acceptance of Contanglo's offer and by a circular of Apr. 3 it did so. On Apr. 17 Contanglo declared the offer unconditional, and on Apr. 18 requested the plaintiff company's board to transfer the whole of the plaintiff company's cash and funds to the Whitehall branch of the National. On Apr. 21 the plaintiff company's board passed a resolution for such transfer from Barclays Bank to the branch of National. On Apr. 22 Contanglo, on Mr. Cradock's instructions, requested the plaintiff company to sell its gilt-edged securities and tax reserve certificates and pay the proceeds to the plaintiff company's account at the National Bank, Whitehall branch. On Apr. 23 Contanglo wrote to Mr. Cradock that it had arranged to complete the purchase of the shares at the plaintiff company's board

- A meeting on Apr. 24 and that Mr. Meaden and Mr. Barlow-Lawson would then be appointed directors and would resign as soon as Mr. Cradock made the payments for which he was liable to Contanglo; and that Mr. Cradock intended to make such payments at a board meeting of the plaintiff company summoned for Apr. 25. Also on Apr. 23 Mr. Sarsfield, one of three directors of Woodstock, wrote to Mr. Cradock as follows: "Dear Mr. Cradock", and the heading is "The Selangor United Rubber Estates, Ltd.",

- "Further to our telephone conversation this afternoon, I confirm the arrangements whereby you will complete the transaction to purchase 719,579 2s. ordinary shares in the above company on Friday, Apr. 25. It is understood that Contanglo Banking & Trading Co., Ltd. will produce a bankers draft in favour of Woodstock Trust, Ltd. for £235,799 representing the balance in the account of Selangor United. We shall then make a loan to you of a similar amount and you in your turn will produce a bankers draft for £195,322 5s. 2d. in favour of Contanglo representing the purchase consideration for the shares. It is further agreed that Woodstock Trust will pay interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum on the loan from Selangor United and that we shall charge you a rate of ten per cent per annum on the same amount, making a net fee to us of two per cent., for the period in which the money is outstanding. I also confirm that I shall be present at 11 o'clock on Friday at the National Bank Ltd., 15, Whitehall."

- The fee of two per cent. was in fact reduced to one per cent., and the figure of £235,799 was erroneous, being more than the balance in the plaintiff company's account.

- On Apr. 23 Mr. Cradock telephoned Mr. McMinn, the manager of the Oxford Street branch of the District Bank, and said that he might influence the transfer of the plaintiff company's bank account to District. He requested Mr. McMinn to prepare a banker's draft in favour of Contanglo for £195,322 and asked for District's representative to attend at the National Whitehall branch to collect a banker's draft in favour of Mr. Cradock for £235,000 odd. This was confirmed by a letter of Apr. 24 from Mr. Cradock to Mr. McMinn. Mr. McMinn, reporting on May 20 to his general manager, said:

- "I understand that the second draft would cover the issue of the first and the arrangement was agreed on this basis."

- I am completely satisfied that it was on this basis that the arrangement was in fact agreed. This £235,000 odd corresponded with the erroneous figure of £235,799 appearing in Mr. Sarsfield's letter of Apr. 23 to Mr. Cradock (which I have already referred to) as representing the balance of the plaintiff company's account.

- On Apr. 24 the manager of the National Bank, Whitehall branch, wrote to the plaintiff company's secretaries that cheques for the accepting shareholders were being sent on that day. On the same day, at a meeting of the plaintiff company's board which Mr. Levinson attended, the bank's letter was tabled and then Mr. Barlow-Lawson and Mr. Meaden were appointed as additional directors, the secretaries were instructed to leave the plaintiff company's fund on current account and Mr. Roberts and Mr. Fenton resigned from the board. On the same day, a letter from the plaintiff company signed at any rate by Mr. Barlow-Lawson, if not also by Mr. Meaden, asked Mr. Snell to arrange for a banker's draft for £236,964 to be made out to the order of the District Bank. This sum represented the balance of the plaintiff company's account at National which did not include the proceeds of sale of the plaintiff company's stock reserve certificate for which payment had not then been received.

On the morning of Apr. 25, a board meeting of the plaintiff company was held in Mr. Snell's office at the Whitehall branch of the National. There were present Mr. Barlow-Lawson, Mr. Meaden, Mr. Jacob and, in attendance, Mr. Ringshall for the secretaries, Mr. Levinson and Mr. Scott for Contanglo, Mr. Reynolds for District, Mr. Cradock, and for Woodstock Mr. Sarsfield. Mr. Snell welcomed those who came to the meeting and then left. The room was a small room some fifteen feet by sixteen feet, but in this room two groups formed, one at the desk in the room and consisting of Mr. Levinson, Mr. Barlow-Lawson, Mr. Meaden, Mr. Jacob and Mr. Ringshall, and another outer group of Mr. Scott, Mr. Cradock, Mr. Sarsfield and Mr. Reynolds, probably nearer the door and probably to some extent standing and to some extent sitting. The meeting fell into three stages, first preliminary chat, then the board phase dealing with resolutions, and then documentation to carry out what had been arranged.

In the first phase (i) Mr. Cradock told Mr. Reynolds in particular that a board meeting of the plaintiff company was to take place and that the plaintiff company's account would be transferred from National to District, Oxford Street branch; (ii) Mr. Sarsfield told Mr. Reynolds in particular that the plaintiff company would draw a cheque on its new account with District in favour of Woodstock which would endorse it in favour of Mr. Cradock, and he asked if this re-arrangement would be all right and Mr. Reynolds agreed to it; (iii) Mr. Reynolds thereupon handed over the draft which he had brought with him, drawn by and on District for £195,000 in favour of Contanglo. He either handed it to Mr. Cradock who handed it to Mr. Levinson or he handed it direct to Mr. Levinson, but the difference is immaterial.

In the board meeting stage, although Mr. Barlow-Lawson was in the chair formally or, more accurately, nominally in the minutes, Mr. Levinson was in complete and exclusive control of the meeting. At this stage, resolutions were passed appointing Mr. Jacob as additional director and that Mr. Meaden's resignation as director be accepted, that a bank account be opened at the Oxford Street branch of District; that £232,764 odd (which included the proceeds of sale of the tax reserve certificates) on current account with National be transferred to that branch of District; and that £232,500 be deposited with Woodstock at eight per cent. per annum interest subject to withdrawal on demand. It was also recorded that Mr. Meaden, Mr. Scott and Mr. Levinson withdrew from the meeting. I mention these resolutions and the withdrawal of the Contanglo representatives without regard to the order in which they occurred. There was considerable dispute about the order and, in particular, whether the Contanglo representatives withdrew before or after the resolution to deposit the plaintiff company's moneys with Woodstock, since it became a crucial part of Contanglo's case that they had no knowledge whatsoever about any loan to Woodstock. The plaintiff company, however, was content not to rely on this withdrawal having taken place at any particular point.

In the course of the third phase of the meeting, documentation, though without regard to the precise order in which the events occurred, Mr. Reynolds received (i), for payment into the plaintiff company's new account with District, two drafts totalling £232,764 6s. 9d. from National to District, one draft for £226,964 6s. 9d. representing the balance of the plaintiff company's credit at National apart from the proceeds of sale of tax reserve certificates, and the other draft for £5,800 representing those proceeds of sale; (ii) a mandate form made out by Mr. Barlow-Lawson and signed by Mr. Barlow-Lawson, Mr. Jacob and Mr. Ringshall for the purpose of operating the plaintiff company's account with District; (iii) a cheque for £232,500 signed by Mr. Barlow-Lawson and Mr. Jacob in favour of Woodstock and endorsed specially to Mr. Cradock by Mr. Sarsfield for Woodstock; (iv) probably paying-in slips in respect of the drafts from National to District and a paying-in slip in respect of the cheque endorsed to Mr. Cradock; and (v) an undertaking signed by Mr. Snell, addressed to the manager of the District Oxford Street branch, to deliver to him 713,579 2s. stock units in the plaintiff company with a complete transfer deed in favour of District Bank (London) Nominees, Ltd. as soon as formalities of stamping the registration had

A been completed. This undertaking was handed to Mr. Reynolds when he was on the point of leaving and he assumed that it was handed by a representative of the National Bank.

Mr. Reynolds returned with these documents and reported to Mr. McMinn, the manager of the District Oxford Street branch. Mr. McMinn was "horrified". Mr. Reynolds had parted with the draft for £195,322 and although he had drafts B for £232,764, payable into the plaintiff company's new account, what he had for transfer into Mr. Cradock's account to cover the £195,322 draft was not a draft but a cheque drawn on the plaintiff company's account. In view of the draft payable into the plaintiff company's account, the plaintiff company's cheque would have been as effectual as a draft if it were properly payable to Mr. Cradock. The horrifying difficulty was that it was only payable to Mr. Cradock by reason C of an endorsement for a limited company. Mr. McMinn was therefore concerned to make certain that the endorsement was valid. So he set about getting the endorsement confirmed by Woodstock and eventually he obtained the necessary confirmation from the other two directors of Woodstock on May 30 and ultimately in 1959 of a board meeting of Woodstock. On Apr. 25, however, he paid the £232,754 6s. 9d. drafts into the plaintiff company's account, debited the amount D of the cheque for £232,500 to the plaintiff company's account, and credited it to Mr. Cradock's account. Thus he covered the payment of £195,000 draft. It would appear from Mr. Cradock's account with District, and is stated in a letter of June 16, 1958, from Mr. McMinn to his general manager, that the difference between £195,000 and the £232,500 was used by Cradock for his own purposes and the purposes of his companies.

E On Apr. 25 Contango paid into its own account with National the £195,322 5s. 2d. and paid out of that account into an account with National opened for itself with itself £188,809 18s. 1d. Out of that account with National the accepting stockholders were paid, together with certain fees, leaving nil in the account.

Eventually, as I have said, and in accordance with the undertaking handed to Mr. Reynolds at the meeting of Apr. 25, the stock was transferred to and F registered in the District nominee company as nominee for Mr. Cradock.

THE SECOND TRANSACTION

In between the first and second transactions a Mr. Adrian Jacobs was appointed chairman of the plaintiff company. Mr. Barlow-Lawson resigned from the board, as I have said, and Mr. Cradock's stock in the plaintiff company was G transferred first on Sept. 25, 1958, to Mr. Cradock and on Jan. 5, 1959, to G. & C. Finance, Ltd. as nominee for Mr. Cradock. On Feb. 24, 1959, G. & C. Finance, Ltd. was registered as holder of the stock and was issued the stock certificate. On Aug. 26, 1958, the plaintiff company's account at District was transferred to the Nova Scotia Bank where it opened with a credit of some £700 and the usual documents authorising the directors to sign for the plaintiff company's H cheques drawn on the account were sent to the Nova Scotia Bank, Waterloo Place branch.

Some little time before Jan. 26, 1960, Mr. Burden agreed to buy from Mr. Cradock his stockholding in the plaintiff company and two persons Mr. Stekel and Mr. Kraft acted as intermediaries between them and as agents for both of them. There were, I find, two meetings of the plaintiff company's I board on Jan. 26, although it is just possible that the second meeting took place on Jan. 27; the difference is however immaterial. At the first meeting, held at Mr. Cradock's head office, there were present Mr. Jacobs and Mr. Jacob and in attendance a Mr. Mitchell, and a Mr. Sterling representing the secretaries, Weavers, and a Mr. Curtis and a Mr. Short representing Henry Briggs, Son & Co. (Trust), Ltd., a Cradock company. Mr. Cradock, Mr. Stekel and Mr. Kraft were on the premises and there was a good deal of going to and fro between the room where the meeting was held and other parts of Mr. Cradock's premises. Mr. Burden and Mr. Sinclair were not on the premises at all. It was resolved that the indebtedness of Woodstock to the plaintiff company, consequent on the first transaction, and the indebtedness of the two Cradock companies, F.R.C. Properties and General Investment, Ltd. and M. D. R. Motors, Ltd. (for a total of £6,400) should be taken over, as to £207,500 by Mr. Cradock, and as to £42,000 or the balance of the indebtedness by Henry Briggs Son & Co. (Trust), Ltd.: that a cheque for £207,500 in settlement of Cradock's liability be handed to Mr. Burden's representative for payment into the plaintiff company's account; and that bills for a total of £42,000 payable on future specified dates be drawn on Briggs' settlement of Briggs' liability. Mr. Jacob and Mr. A. Jacobs resigned as directors and Mr. Burden and Mr. Sinclair were appointed directors.

No representative of Woodstock was present when the resolution about taking over Woodstock's liability was passed. On Jan. 27 there was an exchange of cheques for £245,761 12s. each between Mr. Cradock and Woodstock and they passed through Martins Bank where Woodstock and apparently Mr. Cradock had accounts. This sum, it is said, represented the £232,500, plus outstanding interest, and Woodstock wrote to Mr. Cradock on Jan. 27, 1960, that they had that day "repaid you £242,671 12s. being a principal and part interest on a sum of £232,500". The position about this is by no means clear but it looks as though Woodstock and Mr. Cradock were intending to eliminate Mr. Cradock's liability to Woodstock and that he should be liable, in Woodstock's place, to the plaintiff company. In due course Mr. Burden obtained a blank transfer of Mr. Cradock's stock in the plaintiff company, duly executed by G. & C. Finance, Ltd.

At the second meeting Mr. Sinclair was appointed chairman and Mr. Burden secretary and it was resolved that the plaintiff company should open an account with the Bank of Nova Scotia, although in fact, as I have said, the plaintiff company already had an account with that bank. The usual banking resolution was passed. A mandate appropriate for the opening of such an account was signed by Mr. Burden and Mr. Sinclair, authorising, inter alia, cheques drawn on the account to be signed by the chairman and secretary or any two directors. It is not disputed that it was a valid mandate. This is the authority relied on by the Bank of Nova Scotia for making the payment in respect of which the claim is made against it on the ground of constructive trusteeship and negligence. Mr. Stekel or Mr. Kraft, or both, came with Mr. Cradock's cheque for £207,500 in favour of the plaintiff company and handed it to Mr. Burden. A cheque for the same amount was drawn in accordance with the mandate by Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Burden for the plaintiff company: and Mr. Burden drew a cheque for the same amount on his own account in favour of Mr. Cradock. All three cheques for £207,500 each were handed to a solicitor, a Mr. Bieber, "as a stakeholder".

On Feb. 10, 1960, Mr. Bieber took the three cheques to the Nova Scotia Bank Waterloo Place branch, where he had an interview with a Mr. Evans who, in the manager's absence, was in charge of the branch. He explained that the cheques were being exchanged for "internal accounting reasons" or "internal book-keeping reasons". On that day all three cheques were debited and credited as they directed.

The Westminster Bank refused to discount the bills for £42,000 and on Feb. 19 Mr. Cradock sent the plaintiff company a cheque for £42,000 in place of the bills, which were later handed to Mr. Cradock. This cheque, however, was part of a further series of three cheques, drawn like the three cheques for £207,500, but for an amount of £42,000 each. On Feb. 25, 1960, they were likewise debited and credited to the three accounts at the Nova Scotia Waterloo Place branch. The evidence about these three cheques is thin. On Feb. 9, 1960, the date which the three cheques bore, Mr. Burden entered into an agreement with Mr. Cradock to purchase all the shares in H. C. Hopper (Norwich), Ltd. for £78,000, payable as to £42,000 in cash and the balance of £36,000 in bills drawn by Mr. Cradock and accepted by Mr. Burden. Mr. Burden was expressed to make the agreement "as agent for and on behalf of" without indicating the

- A principal in any way. Mr. Burden said he intended the plaintiff company to have "Hopper". There are unsigned minutes of a board meeting of the plaintiff company on Mar. 30, 1960, purporting to record a resolution for investment of the plaintiff company's money in short term loans "pending the result of an investigation into an engineering business which it was suggested the company should purchase". Mr. Sinclair said that nothing mentioned in this unsigned minute of a resolution was ever considered. In a memorandum of Apr. 5, 1960, to Mr. Burden, Mr. Sinclair said "particulars as to paying in of requisite assets are awaited". Whatever any particular person may, however, have intended with regard to H. C. Hopper (Norwich), Ltd., on May 31, 1960, Mr. Burden and Mr. Cradock cancelled their agreement for its sale to Mr. Burden on Mr. Cradock accepting bills drawn by Mr. Burden or his nominee for a total of £10,000. No "Hopper" asset and no part of the £10,000 ever reached the plaintiff company.

QUESTIONS OF LAW

The following questions of law arise:

1. How far are directors trustees of their companies' funds?
- D 2. How far is a director who acts on the direction of a third party to be ascribed the relevant knowledge or state of mind of the third party?
3. How far can a stranger to a trust be liable as constructive trustee in respect of a breach of the trust?
4. What is the liability to its customer in negligence of a bank which pays out of its customers' account?
- E As each of these questions affect more than one defendant and as they are conveniently considered apart from the facts, I will deal with them before considering the cases against the individual defendants. Five further questions involving considerations of law, however, arise. They are:
5. How far did any novation replace the liability of Woodstock to the plaintiff company by liability of Mr. Cradock and Mr. Briggs to the plaintiff company and preclude the plaintiff company from succeeding in its claim against Woodstock?
- F 6. How far was the payment to the plaintiff company of the £249,000 satisfaction of its claim in respect of the first transaction?
7. Was there any loss to the plaintiff company by reason of the second transaction?

8. Whether the payments by the plaintiff company of the £232,500 and £207,500, in respect of which it claims, are irrecoverable because made illegal by s. 54 of the Companies Act 1948 (1)?
- G

9. Should the individual defendants Mr. Barlow-Lawson, Mr. Jacob, Mr. Burden and Mr. Sinclair be relieved under s. 448 of the Companies Act, 1948 (2)?

- H These questions involve considerations of law and fact together. Questions 6-9 affect more than one defendant. Questions 5-8 involve the inter-relationship of the first and second transactions. It will in the circumstances be convenient to deal with them after I have considered (subject to these questions) the cases against each of the defendants separately; and in the order in which I have numbered the questions.

1. Directors as trustees of their companies' funds.

- I The first question of law that arises is how far directors are trustees of their companies' funds. It is clear and not disputed that they owe a fiduciary duty to the company to apply its assets only for the purpose of the company and are therefore liable for breach of that duty; but the question how far they are trustees bears on the question how other defendants can be made liable as constructive trustees as claimed.

On occasion directors have been said to be trustees and on occasion not to be trustees. Like so many interminable arguments in philosophy, economics and everyday life, its resolution depends largely on definition of terms in this case of "trustees" and then on the ambit of its proper application to directors. A

(1) For s. 54 see 3 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 507.

(2) For s. 448, see 3 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 784.

Directors are clearly not trustees identically with trustees of a will or marriage settlement. In particular, so far as at present relevant, they have business to conduct and business functions to perform in a business manner, which are not normally at any rate associated with trustees of a will or marriage settlement. All their duties, powers and functions qua directors are fiduciary for and on behalf of the company. So property in their hands or under their control is theirs for the company, i.e., for the company's purposes in accordance with their duties, powers and functions. However much the company's purposes and the directors' duties, powers and functions may differ from the purposes of a strict settlement and the duties powers and functions of its trustees, the directors and such trustees have this indisputably in common—that the property in their lands or under their control must be applied for the specified purposes of the company or the settlement; and to apply it otherwise is to mis-apply it in breach of the obligation to apply it to those purposed for the company or the settlement beneficiaries. So, even though the scope and operation of such obligation differs in the case of directors and strict settlement trustees, the nature of the obligation with regard to property in their hands or under their control is identical, namely to apply it to specified purposes for others beneficially. This is to hold it on trust for the company or the settlement beneficiaries as the case may be. That is what holding it on trust means. That is why a misapplication of it is equally in each case a breach of trust. This is just not treating as a breach of trust something which is not a breach of trust. No ground has been suggested for treating it as a breach of trust except that it is a breach of trust. It would be topsy turvy, as seems sometimes to have been suggested, to make the mis-application of property that is held a breach of trust (and not just treat it as a breach of trust, though not a breach of trust) without the property having been held on trust and thus convert into a trust what was not a trust before the misapplication. B C D E

It has been said that the director is not in all respects in the position of a trustee in respect of an unpaid debt and that a bank account credit, like that of the plaintiff company with its banks in this case, is an unpaid debt from the bank to the customer. Normally a trustee of a strict settlement has to get in unpaid debts, whereas a director has to treat unpaid debts with due regard to the commercial purposes which he is serving and perhaps therefore not press for their payment. A bank credit differs, however, from such unpaid debts which a trustee has to get in—to get in, be it observed, perhaps by having it paid into the trust bank account—and it differs from the ordinary commercial debts owing to a company. In general, the bank's debt to its customer for the credit in his account, though legally a debt, is, in substance and every day experience and conduct of our affairs, moneys within the control of the customer—the customer's moneys at the bank, cash at the bank. In the present case there is no dispute about the fact of payments of the plaintiff company's moneys out of the plaintiff company's bank accounts but only of their nature and significance and whether they amounted to a misapplication. The very application of the plaintiff company's moneys of which complaint is made by the plaintiff company would have been impossible if the defendant directors did not have and exercise effective control of these moneys. Those directors were the only directors of the company and the directors who were authorised to operate the company's bank account. Indeed, a crucial part of the defence (namely that which relies on the conclusiveness of the mandate) is that they had that control. F G H I

I will now refer to passages in the authorities.

In Re City Equitable Fire Insurance Co., Ltd. (3), ROMER, J., said (4):

(3) [1924] All E.R. Rep. 485; [1925] Ch. 407.

(4) [1925] Ch. at p. 426.

- A "It has sometimes been said that directors are trustees. If this means no more than that directors in the performance of their duties stand in a fiduciary relationship to the company, the statement is true enough. But if the statement is meant to be an indication by way of analogy of what those duties are, it appears to me to be wholly misleading. I can see but little resemblance between the duties of a director and the duties of a trustee of a will or of a marriage settlement. It is indeed impossible to describe the duty of directors in general terms, whether by way of analogy or otherwise. The position of a director of a company carrying on a small retail business is very different from that of a director of a railway company."

Later he said (5):

- C "The manner in which the work of the company is to be distributed between the board of directors and the staff is in truth a business matter to be decided on business lines . . . It has been laid down that so long as a director acts honestly he cannot be made responsible in damages unless guilty of gross or culpable negligence in a business sense."

- D In Russell v. Wakefield Waterworks Co. (6) SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in a passage explaining that the appropriate person to apply to the court for repayment of misapplied funds of a company was, not the shareholders, but the company, said:

- E "The answer was that, where the owner of the trust fund is an incorporated company, the corporation is the only party to sue; the stranger has nothing whatever to do with the individual corporators; and although in a sense it is their property, because individual corporators make up the corporation, yet in law it is not their property, but the property of the corporation, and therefore the right person to sue is the corporation, who is the cestui que trust or equitable owner of the fund. That I take to be the general rule of this court. In this court the money of the company is a trust fund, because it is applicable only to the special purposes of the company in the hands of the agents of the company, and it is in that sense a trust fund applicable by them to those special purposes; and a person taking it from them with notice that it is being applied to other purposes cannot in this court say that he is not a constructive trustee."

In Re Lands Allotment Co. (7) LINDLEY, L.J., said:

- G "Although directors are not properly speaking trustees, yet they have always been considered and treated as trustees of money which comes to their hands or which is actually under their control; and ever since joint stock companies were invented directors have been held liable to make good moneys which they have misapplied upon the same footing as if they were trustees . . ."

- H KAY, L.J., said (8):

"I conceive that the directors of every company, being the managing agents of a trading concern, have considerable authority and power in dealing with outstanding debts due to the concern . . ."

He added a little later (9):

- I "... but if they deal with the funds of a company, although those funds are not absolutely vested in them, but funds which are under their control, in a manner which is beyond their powers, then, as to that dealing, they are treated as having committed a breach of trust."

(5) [1925] Ch. at p. 427.

(7) [1894] 1 Ch. 616 at p. 631, cf., [1891-94] All E.R. Rep. 1032 at p. 1034.

(8) [1891-94] All E.R. Rep. at p. 1037; [1894] 1 Ch. at p. 637.

Then he said (10):

"... directors are not always trustees. As directors they are not trustees at all. They are only trustees qua the particular property which is in their hands or under their control, and which they have applied in a manner which is beyond the powers of the company. I conceive that qua such fund they are constructive trustees, or trustees by implication of law..."

In Re Forest of Dean Coal Mining Co. (11) SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in dealing with the responsibility of directors in respect of debts due to a company, said (12):

"Traders have a discretion as to whether they shall sue their customers, a discretion which is not vested in the trustees of a debt under a settlement."

He added (13):

"Again, directors are called trustees. They are no doubt trustees of assets which have come into their hands, or which are under their control, but they are not trustees of a debt due to the company... A director is the managing partner of the concern, and although a debt is due to the concern I do not think it is right to call him a trustee of that debt which remains unpaid, though his liability in respect of it may in certain cases and in some respects be analogous to the liability of a trustee. So much for the question of unpaid debts."

So, in my view, in general as in this case a credit in a company's bank account which the directors are authorised to operate are moneys of the company under the control of those directors and are held by them on trust for the company in accordance with its purposes.

2. How far is a director who acts on the direction of a third party bound by the state of mind of that third party?

How far, as put in argument, the director who acts, without exercising any discretion, at the direction of a stranger to the company is, in respect of his liability for funds under his control (for which he is, as I have concluded, a trustee) to have ascribed to him the purpose of that stranger, or, as I prefer to put it and which comes to much the same thing in our case and is sufficient for present purposes, how far is he bound by the stranger's knowledge of the nature of the transaction.

In Gray v. Lewis, (14) MELLISH, L.J., said:

"If a person allows himself to be the mere nominee of, and acts for another person, he must be bound by the notice which that other person for whom he acts has of the nature of the transaction."

Moreover, that was said with reference to a fraudulent and illegal transaction. The nominees in that case were not directors but purchasers of shares.

In Land Credit Co. of Ireland v. Lord Fermoy (15) a company's funds were used by a duly appointed directors' sub-committee to buy the company's shares in order to raise the price and keep up a fictitious appearance of credit. This operation was carried out and cloaked by the sub-committee in the guise of loans, which were then used to buy the shares. The sub-committee disclosed the loans to the full board but not their purpose and use. The loans were not of unusual amount and there was nothing about them to put the board on enquiry. So a director who was not involved in the transaction, otherwise than as a member of the board, and presumed to have just the knowledge disclosed to the board, was held not liable to repay to the company the amount of the loan. The sub-committee was duly appointed and acted within the ambit of its authority in

- A making the loans, its only report was of the loans and the loans qua loans were unexceptionable. The director therefore acted perfectly properly within the ambit of his responsibility, having regard to the proper delegation of responsibility to the sub-committee in accordance with the company's constitution. The objectionable part was concealed by the sub-committee, namely that the loans were but means of purchasing the company's shares with the company's money.
- B In these circumstances it was said "a director cannot be held liable for being defrauded".

That does not touch, however, on the case of a nominee director putting himself blindly at the disposal of a stranger without status in the company, except the irrelevant status for present purposes of shareholder. The Land Credit Co. case (16) does not impinge in any way on the observations of MELLISH, L.J.,

- C which I have quoted (17).

In my view, a director acting in a transaction on the direction of a stranger is fixed with that stranger's knowledge of the nature of that transaction.

3. Stranger's liability as constructive trustee.

- I come now to the question how far a stranger to the trust can become liable
- D as constructive trustee in respect of a breach of the trust.

It is essential at the outset to distinguish two very different kinds of so-called constructive trustees. (i) Those who, though not appointed trustees, take on themselves to act as such and to possess and administer trust property for the beneficiaries, such as trustees de son tort. Distinguishing features for present purposes are (a) they do not claim to act in their own right but for the beneficiaries,

- E and (b) their assumption to act is not of itself a ground of liability (save in the sense of course of liability to account and for any failure in the duty so assumed), and so their status as trustees preceeds the occurrence which may be the subject of claim against them. (ii) Those whom a court of equity will treat as trustees by reason of their action, of which complaint is made. Distinguishing features are (a) that such trustees claim to act in their own right and not for beneficiaries,
- F and (b) no trusteeship arises before, but only by reason of, the action complained of.

Until the limitation provisions of the Trustee Act, 1925, the first category of constructive trustees could not rely, in defence of claims against them, on statutory limitation or the analogous rules enforced by courts of equity. This was because they acted as trustees for others, and therefore held in right of those

- G others and therefore time was held not to run in their favour against those others; but as the second category of trustees claimed in their own right, time ran in their favour from their obtaining possession. It is largely by reason of this distinction that the first category of constructive trustee is sometimes referred to or included in the authorities under the term "express trustee" (see Taylor v. Davies (18); Soar v. Ashwell (19), especially the judgments of LORD ESHER, M.R., (20) and
- H BOWEN, L.J. (21)).

It has long been well established that a bank is not a trustee for its customer of the amount to his credit in his bank account (see, for example, Foley v. Hill (22) and Burdick v. Garrick (23), per LORD HATHERLEY, L.C.). In view of this, and the circumstances in which the constructive trusteeship relied on by the plaintiff company against the defendants is said to arise, the plaintiff company does not

I rely at all in this case on the establishment of the first category of constructive trusteeship, but exclusively on the second category. The first category is irrelevant to the plaintiff company's case. The cases of Soar v. Ashwell (24), Burdick v. Garrick (25), Re Barney, Barney v. Barney (26), Mara v. Browne (27) and Williams-Ashman v. Price & Williams (28) to which I was referred, fall within that first category.

Barnes v. Addy (29) contains a formulation of the second category of constructive trusteeship, on which the plaintiff relies. In that case Barnes was husband of the life tenant of the trust, was appointed sole trustee by Addy, the sole surviving trustee, and subsequently misappropriated the trust fund. The question before the Court of Appeal was whether the solicitors engaged in respect of the appointment were liable to make good the amount misappropriated. LORD SELBORNE, L.C., referred to both categories of constructive trustees. He said (30):

"That responsibility [that is the responsibility of express trustees] may no doubt be extended in equity to others who are not properly trustees, if they are found either making themselves trustees de son tort, or actually participating in any fraudulent conduct of the trustee to the injury of the cestui que trust. But, on the other hand, strangers are not to be made constructive trustees merely because they act as the agents of trustees in transactions within their legal powers, transactions, perhaps of which a court of equity may disapprove, unless those agents receive and become chargeable with some part of the trust property, or unless they assist with knowledge in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees."

In that passage he refers to the first category as "trustees de son tort" and as persons who "receive and become chargeable with some part of the trust property", and he refers to the second category as "actually participating in any fraudulent conduct of the trustee to the injury of the cestui que trust" and as those who "assist with knowledge in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees". This is virtually repeated by LORD ESHER, M.R., in Soar v. Ashwell (31) where he refers to Barnes v. Addy (29):

"There is another recognised state of circumstances in which a person not nominated a trustee may be bound to liability as if he were a nominated trustee, namely, where he has knowingly assisted a nominated trustee in a fraudulent and dishonest disposition of the trust property."

It is this formulation in Barnes v. Addy (32) "... assist with knowledge in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees", that is the basis of the plaintiff company's claim that the defendants are liable as constructive trustees. There are thus three elements: (1) assistance by the stranger, (2) with knowledge, (3) in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees. As appears from the passage quoted, an agent acting for a trustee is a stranger within its meaning in that passage, so that he is not liable as a constructive trustee within the second category, unless he too assists "with knowledge in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees".

What knowledge is required to satisfy the second element? LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in Barnes v. Addy (32), referred to one of the solicitors, a potential constructive trustee, as having no "knowledge or suspicion . . . of an improper or dishonest design", and says that "there was nothing to lead him to suppose" that there was any intention to misappropriate; and he says of the other solicitor

A that (33) "he never knew nor suspected any dishonest purpose". These references leave wide open the question what knowledge is required.

SIR RICHARD KINDERSLEY, V.C., in Bodenham v. Hoskins (34) quoted in Shields v. Bank of Ireland (Governor & Co.) (35) indicated that the knowledge required was of circumstances which made it a dishonest and fraudulent breach of trust, though without dishonest intention on the part of the person with that knowledge. The quotation from SIR RICHARD KINDERSLEY, V.C., in Shields v. Bank of Ireland (36):

"I am constrained to arrive at the conclusion that the bankers, although I must exonerate them from any deliberate intention to commit a robbery or commit a fraud, still were not only parties to the simple fact of the transfer, but were parties to the fraud in question, in this sense, that they were aware of the circumstances which made it a fraud in Parkes, to make the transfer to his private account, and being cognisant of that, and having been cognisant of it before the time when the account was opened under the name of 'The Rotherwas Account', and being cognisant of it throughout, they concur in a transaction, the effect of which is, that for their own pecuniary benefit an act is done by Parkes which is a fraud upon the plaintiff. Now, according to the plain principles of a court of equity such an act can never be sustained . . ."

The plaintiff company accepts and relies on this view. PORTER, M.R., referring to the quotation which I have just read from SIR RICHARD KINDERSLEY, V.C., said (37):

" . . . he very charitably refrains from arriving at the inference, which he might well have drawn, that the bankers deliberately intended themselves to commit a robbery or a fraud."

In these circumstances he may well, and very understandably so it seems to me, have had little use for the distinction between knowledge of the circumstances which constitute a fraud and knowledge of fraudulent intent. At any rate, whilst not dissenting from what SIR RICHARD KINDERSLEY, V.C., said, he added (38):

"you must . . . show that the bankers knew of and concurred in the intention to misapply, a knowledge which will easily be presumed if the banker derives a personal benefit from the transaction designed or stipulated for."

He preferred a more vigorous approach and to rely on a finding of fact rather than a refinement of law. In that case both courses led to the same result. But there may well be cases, of which the present case may be one, in which a finding of fact cannot properly dispense with SIR RICHARD KINDERSLEY, V.C.'s formulation.

In the last sentence of the passage quoted from SIR RICHARD KINDERSLEY, V.C. (39), it is made plain that the act in respect of which relief is given is an act to be judged according to "the plain principles of a court of equity". It seems to me imperative to grasp and keep constantly in mind that the second category of constructive trusteeship (which is the only category with which we are concerned) is nothing more than a formula for equitable relief. The court of equity says that the defendant shall be liable in equity, as though he were a trustee. He is made liable in equity as trustee by the imposition or construction of the court of equity. This is done because in accordance with equitable principles applied by the court of equity it is equitable that he should be held liable as though he were a trustee. Trusteeship and constructive trusteeship are equitable conceptions.

The court of equity is not administering criminal law but equity. It is equity and not criminal law or even tort or contract that governs whether a person shall be liable in equity as constructive trustee. So, whether a mis-application of a company's funds for the purchase of its shares occasions the imposition of liability as constructive trustees, depends not on the statutory provision making it a criminal offence, or on statute or criminal law, or common law conceptions, but on equity and its principles. As mentioned in argument, there are criminal offences nowadays which are not morally reprehensible and are not even blameworthy. Indeed, it appears that nowadays, by Act of Parliament, a person is made criminal although he can unquestionably and conclusively prove that he did not even know the facts that establish the crime. If, indeed, this is so, this is crime without guilt. It is to brand such proven innocents as convicted criminals. It may be convenient policing. It is not justice, and it certainly is not equity. On the other hand, there may be actions, dishonest and fraudulent in the eyes of equity, yet not punishable under the criminal law. Equity is not crime and this court is not the Old Bailey; and it is according to "the plain principles of a court of equity" which this court is, in its administration of equitable relief, that what is "dishonest and fraudulent" has to be judged. Moreover, the language used by the courts of equity, in the authorities referred to, must be similarly understood in accordance with their equitable principles and conceptions. This may all seem over emphatic emphasis of the obvious; but it is an emphasis that I have found essential if confusion is to be avoided.

Equity is concerned to give effect to equitable interests, though bereft of legal ownership. Thus it will trace trust property into the hands of a volunteer, where it is not inequitable to do so, and will hold a purchaser for value liable as constructive trustee if he had actual or constructive notice that the transfer to him was of trust property in breach of trust (see the statement in SNELL'S PRINCIPLES OF EQUITY (26th Edn.) pp. 202, 203, which was relied on by the plaintiff company and the defendants). Moreover, in conveyancing (apart from the intrusion of statute) actual or constructive notice of equitable right is enough to fasten a grantee with knowledge of those rights. The governing consideration is to give effect to equitable rights, where it is not inequitable to do so, and when knowledge of the existence of those rights is material to granting equitable relief. In general, at any rate, it is equitable that a person with actual notice or constructive notice of those rights should be fixed with knowledge of them. This is in a context of producing equitable results in a civil action and not in the context of criminal liability. The sort of question to which it is directed is which of two persons should in equity bear the loss; and not whether one of them should be sent to prison. So this seems to me to be the very understandable, and indeed equitable, approach of equity.

In Lloyd v. Banks (40) LORD CAIRNS, L.C., brings out clearly that equity is concerned with knowledge of equitable interests, because it is concerned with fastening on the conscience of the person with that knowledge. In that case a trustee of a fund saw, in a newspaper, notice of a petition to the insolvent debtors' court presented by his cestui que trust and acted on it. The question was whether a subsequent assignee of the cestui que trust, who gave the trustee formal notice of the assignment, acquired priority over the assignee in insolvency. The case thus did not turn on constructive notice but on the source of actual knowledge which the trustee had.

LORD CAIRNS said (41):

"... but I am quite prepared to say that I think the court would expect to find that those who alleged that the trustee had knowledge of the incumbrance had made it out, not by any evidence of casual conversations, much less by any proof of what would only be constructive notice—but by proof

(40) (1868), 3 Ch. App. 488.

(41) (1868), 3 Ch. App. at pp. 490, 491.

A that the mind of the trustee has in some way been brought to an intelligent apprehension of the nature of the incumbrance which has come upon the property, so that a reasonable man, or an ordinary man of business, would act upon the information and would regulate his conduct by it in the execution of the trust. If it can be shown that in any way the trustee has got knowledge of that kind—knowledge which would operate upon the mind of
 B any rational man, or man of business, and make him act with reference to the knowledge he has so acquired—then I think the end is attained, and that there has been fixed upon the conscience of the trustee, and through that upon the trust fund, a security against its being parted with in any way that would be inconsistent with the incumbrance which has been created.”

C It was unsuccessfully submitted that casual notice obtained by a trustee (who had no concern with the notice except to receive it and observe it) was not enough to decide priorities as between equally innocent holders of equitable interests. In that case the trustee had subjective knowledge, which passed the objective test of “knowledge which would operate on the mind of any rational man or man of business”. Would that objective test be sufficient without the subjective knowledge?

D In Berwick-upon-Tweed Corpn. v. Murray (42) William Murray, bound as a surety to the extent of £2,000 to the plaintiff for the due accounting of the office of treasurer by David Murray, received notice that David Murray was a defaulter. He then took from David Murray a deposit note of a bank for £2,300, placed in the bank by David Murray one month previously in the name of his daughter aged twenty-three. It was held that, in the circumstances in which William E Murray received the £2,300, William Murray should have made enquiries and, not having done so, that he was bound to restore the £2,300 with five per cent. interest.

LORD CRANWORTH, L.C., said (43):

F “But were not the circumstances such as must have forced an honest man to make inquiry? He had just received formal notice that David Murray, for whom he had become surety, had refused to account, or to pay the balance due from him. Nothing could be more reasonable than that he should immediately apply to David Murray for indemnity. But when, by way of indemnity, he was offered a deposit note made a month previously by David Murray, in the name of his daughter a young woman of twenty-three
 G years of age, it is impossible that suspicion should not have been excited. [I observe that this was in 1856 not in 1960.] He was bound to ask why such a deposit was made not in David Murray’s own name, but in that of his daughter. It is not alleged that he was ever led to suppose the daughter had any beneficial interest in the money; for what purpose then was her name used? In fact, her name was evidently used as a means of disguising the truth. Perhaps inquiry might not have brought out the truth; but it does not H lie in the mouth of William Murray to say this. He made no inquiry although the circumstances were such as ought to have induced him to do so.”

Then later on he said (44):

I “It is impossible to permit a man who received, by way of security from a defaulting agent, a deposit of money which had been withdrawn from the funds of his principal, to insist in circumstances like these on his ignorance of the truth. I am clearly of opinion, that William Murray must be treated as a person who had notice of the truth.”

In a separate short judgment (45), dealing with interest chargeable on the £2,300, LORD CRANWORTH referred to that sum as “received from David by William under circumstances which have satisfied me that the latter knew it was the money of the corporation". Clearly what he meant by "knew" in that passage was treated by equity as "having notice of the truth", or knowing because of his failure to make enquiry in circumstances in which "an honest man" would have done so. "An honest man" is obviously the ordinary reasonable or honest person. There the test is an objective test. A

In Keane v. Roberts (46) beneficiaries under a will claimed that a defendant bank should account for estate moneys alleged to have been applied by them to liquidate the executors' private account with the bank. It was stated (47) that there was no evidence to that effect. The executors were overdrawn on their private account about £8,000. They authorised the bank to sell assets of the testator and credit the proceeds to their account. There were delays in realising the assets and, in the meantime, they drew bills on the bank by which moneys were remitted to them in Ireland and when assets were realised and paid into the account the overdraft was slightly more than before. As was said (48): B

"In this particular case, however, the remittance of the assets to Ireland was not necessarily a breach of trust in the executors."

The case is thus summarised (49): C

"The present case is not one of purchase or pledge from the executors: it is the case of agents of the executors receiving moneys by the authority of the executors, and remitting it to them in the course of their duty as agents, and in the proper forms of business, leaving the application of it to the purposes of the will wholly in the power of the executors." D

In the course of his judgment SIR JOHN LEACH, V.-C., said (50): E

"With a view to this cause, I have carefully examined every authority upon this subject, and I think the result may be thus stated: Every person who acquires personal assets by a breach of trust, or devastavit in the executor, is responsible to those who are entitled under the will, if he is a party to the breach of trust. Generally speaking, he does not become a party to the breach of trust, by buying or receiving as a pledge for money advanced to the executor at the time any part of the personal assets, whether specifically given by the will or otherwise, because this sale or pledge is held to be prima facie consistent with the duty of an executor. Generally speaking, he does become a party to the breach of trust, by buying or receiving in pledge any part of the personal assets, not for money advanced at the time, but in satisfaction of his private debt, because this sale or pledge is prima facie inconsistent with the duty of an executor. I preface both these propositions with the term 'generally speaking', because they both seem to admit of exceptions." F

It is with these observations in mind that a passage relied on by the defendants has to be understood. It reads (51): G

"If Roberts and De Lord had reason to believe that Thomas and Fennell were so misapplying the assets, it would be difficult to find a ground which would make them responsible for paying to their principals the moneys which had been placed in their hands for the purpose of being remitted to them; that would be to make every trustee accountable for his conduct in the trust to every agent whom he happened to employ, and would carry the principle of constructive trust to an inconvenient and, indeed, to an impracticable length." H

This is a guarded obiter statement. It indicates that it might not be enough to I

A make an agent liable for breach of trust that he pays trust moneys to the trustee his principal, the legal owner to whom they are payable, when he has reason to believe that he was misapplying the trust assets, when—and this is vital, as appears from the judgment itself in the passage quoted (52)—the payment itself did not constitute a breach of trust. That is far removed from our case, where the payments were to strangers and the payments themselves are alleged to constitute, or be part of, the breach of the trust complained of. Moreover, “reason to believe” here may have been intended to mean no more than that circumstances were consistent with misapplication or proper application of the trust fund.

B In Gray v. Johnston (53) a bank paid a cheque for about £800 drawn by an executrix on the estate bank account in favour of a partnership, which she entered into in place of her husband on her husband, the testator’s, death. The cheque was paid into the partnership account in the same bank and it went against the partnership overdraft. No balance was struck and the account continued to be operated as before. It was held that the will beneficiaries were not entitled to have the money replaced by the bank. The relevant nub of the decision for present purposes appears to me to be that, in the circumstances, the payment of the cheque was perfectly consistent with there being no breach of trust, with the result that the bank had no knowledge or notice of breach at all. LORD CAIRNS, L.C., summarised the authorities (54):

C “I say that the result of those authorities is clearly this: in order to hold a banker justified in refusing to pay a demand of his customer, the customer being an executor, and drawing a cheque as an executor, there must, in the first place, be some misapplication, some breach of trust, intended by the executor, and there must in the second place, as was said by SIR JOHN LEACH in the well-known case of Keane v. Roberts (55), be proof that the bankers are privy to the intent to make this misapplication of the trust funds. And to that I think I may safely add, that if it be shown that any personal benefit to the bankers themselves is designed or stipulated for, that circumstance, above all others, will most readily establish the fact that the bankers are in privy with the breach of trust which is about to be committed.”

E This passage again leaves open the question what is to be taken as “proof” of the misapplication and what establishes privy to the intent to make the misapplication. A benefit designed or stipulated for “most readily” establishes it—apparently as evidence of it. How far is shutting one’s eyes to circumstances which indicate misapplication to be taken as establishing or constituting such privy? Nor does LORD WESTBURY (56) deal with this problem.

G In Re Blundell, Blundell v. Blundell (57), a case of a solicitor’s liability as constructive trustee, STIRLING, J., in considering what was required to make a stranger to a trust liable as constructive trustee, said (58):

H “... a stranger to the trust receiving money from the trustee which he knows to be part of the trust estate is not liable as a constructive trustee unless there are facts brought home to him which show that to his knowledge the money is being applied in a manner which is inconsistent with the trust.”

He said (59) that a solicitor having then “no notice” of any breach of trust was not liable. He also said (60):

I “The real difficulty in each case is to determine what is sufficient to fix the solicitors with the liability of constructive trustees. As I have said, they must have been parties to either a breach of trust or fraud, on the part of the trustee, or they must have brought home to them facts which show that the fund was being applied in a manner inconsistent with the trust . . . a mere suspicion or intimation that something is wrong in the administration of the trust will not, to my mind, be sufficient to deprive the solicitor of his right to accept payment out of the trust estate of costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred."

So in the same judgment we have as the test "knowledge the money is being" misapplied, "notice" and having "brought home to him facts which show" misapplication. Such use of terms in the same judgment shows how dangerous it is to pick on "knowledge" in a passage and treat it per se as necessarily meaning actual knowledge. The last of these passages quoted appears to be in line with a passage quoted earlier from Shields v. Bank of Ireland (61) suggesting that the requisite knowledge is of the circumstances which make it a fraudulent breach of trust.

Gray v. Lewis (62), a decision of SIR RICHARD MALINS, V.-C., appears to have been based, as an alternative, on the ratio decidendi that circumstances sufficiently unusual will put a bank on enquiry and may thus fix it with notice of a fraudulent breach of trust. The first two paragraphs of the headnote read (62):

"The Laffitte Company was formed to purchase the business of the Paris Bank of Laffitte. The Paris bank objected to complete the contract until forty thousand shares should have been subscribed for. To effect this object, the International Contract Company guaranteed a subscription of the requisite number of shares. The latter company then applied to the National Bank to discount their bills for £230,000, which they agreed to do upon the guarantee of the Laffitte Company that they would leave in their hands whatever money should be paid in for shares to the amount of the advance. The money was thereupon transferred to the credit of the Contract Company, who provided shareholders, and paid the deposits out of the advances by the bank. In order to procure a settling-day on the Stock Exchange the bank certified that the £230,000 had been deposited with them in payment of shares. The Laffitte Company, by their articles of association, were prohibited from purchasing their own shares . . ."

SIR RICHARD MALINS, V.-C., said (63):

"Upon the whole case I must pronounce these proceedings to have been false, fictitious, and fraudulent; and I am bound, I conceive, by the principles of this court to declare that the National Bank could derive no right under the letters or guarantees of Dec. 8, 1865, and Feb. 6, 1866, which were wholly beyond the powers of the company, and were acted upon for a fraudulent and illegal purpose . . ."

He referred (64) to the transaction as "illegal and fraudulent". He dealt with knowledge and notice and he said (65):

"This company was expressly prohibited, by the 90th clause of its articles of association, from purchasing its own shares, a provision strictly proper in itself, and introduced for the protection of the public, and also to satisfy the committee of the Stock Exchange, which never grants a settling-day to a company unless it is prohibited from such a course of dealing . . . But it is contended by the learned counsel for the National Bank that they did not know of the rule. But I am of opinion that the circumstances show, and there cannot be a doubt, that it was perfectly known to Sir Joseph McKenna and the other officers of the bank, as it undoubtedly was to the directors, Mr. Harvey Lewis and Mr. Henshaw, who were parties to the transaction, and it was impossible that they could be ignorant of it, for it

A would be a scandal upon them, as bankers, to suppose that they were ignorant of such a primary rule in commercial transactions; and, even if they did not know of the rule, I am of opinion that the transaction was one of so unusual and extraordinary a character that it became their duty to inquire and investigate as to the rights of this company to enter into such a transaction in the very first hour of its existence, and I must therefore treat the bank as having had express notice that what was being done was a gross breach of trust, in which they consequently became participators. The rules of this court are perfectly well settled, and so are the rules of honesty and fair dealing, that no party to an illegal or fraudulent contract can derive any benefit from it, and that all persons who obtain possession of trust funds with a knowledge that their title is derived from a breach of trust will be compelled to restore such trust funds."

B In Thomson v. Clydesdale Bank, Ltd. (66), a broker paid a cheque representing proceeds of sale of a client's shares into his own account at the defendant bank, where he was overdrawn. The broker absconded and was found insolvent and the owners of the shares claimed the proceeds of the cheque from the bank. As LORD SHAND said (67), a broker, according to ordinary practice, pays the proceeds of shares which he sells into the credit of his own bank account. Such payment, therefore, does not even suggest misapplication or put the bank on enquiry. LORD HERSCHELL, L.C. (68), LORD WATSON (69), and LORD SHAND (70) said that to recover against the bank, knowledge by the bank of misapplication by payment into the broker's account would have to be established. LORD SHAND (71), referred, however, to such knowledge as capable of being established by "inference from " or "reasonable inference from " "the facts proved"; and he referred to there being (72)

"... no evidence whatever here of facts which could have put the bankers on inquiry or can be founded on as showing that they must have believed or known that this was a misapplication of funds."

F LORD HERSCHELL, L.C. (73), referred to the bank as being disentitled to retain money which it receives when it "... has reason to believe that the payment is being made in fraud of a third person, and that the person making the payment is handing over in discharge of his debt money which he has no right to hand over..."

G So here again "knowledge", apparently, is not treated as being exclusive of "reason to believe" or being put on enquiry.

As in Thomson v. Clydesdale Bank (66) so in Shields v. Bank of Ireland (74), the payment of estate money into an executor's private account did not suggest misapplication. So they "were not bound to enquire".

H In Coleman v. Bucks & Oxon Union Bank (75) payment by the bank of trust moneys into a trustee's personal account was not a breach of trust. It was without any knowledge that a breach of trust by the trustee was intended and without any intention to benefit themselves. So it does not help on the question of notice of breach.

In Backhouse v. Charlton (76) there was nothing to put the bank on enquiry or suggest constructive notice. It was in those circumstances that SIR RICHARD MALINS, V.-C., said that the bank was justified in honouring a cheque signed by a surviving partner out of a partnership account for payment into his own account (as had in fact happened before the death of the other partner) (77) "unless they had express notice that some breach of duty was taking place". I do not read his observation as meaning that the only notice that could in law affect the bank would be express notice. Such an interpretation would be inconsistent with the passages referred to in SIR RICHARD MALINS, V.-C.'s judgment in Gray v. Lewis (78).

In Bank of New South Wales v. Goulburn Valley Butter Co. Proprietary, Ltd. (79), the bank was held not liable to repay to the company moneys which had been standing to the credit of its account with the bank and transferred by cheques of its managing director to his own overdrawn private account. The private account was, like the company's account, operated in connexion with the company's business, with cross-payments for adjustment between them being made by cheque, in the ordinary course of business.

Counsel for the company submitted (80) that the bank knew, or ought to have known, that the managing director was acting wrongfully in transferring funds from the company's account to his account. It was admitted in argument, however, that, if the company was indebted to the managing director when the cheques were paid, then there could be no objection to their payment; and, as there was no evidence that the bank knew that the company was not indebted to the managing director, the case turned on whether there was a duty on the bank to enquire into the state of account between the bank and the managing director. It was held that in the circumstances it was not obliged to do so.

It was a strong committee (81), but they did not state that absence of actual knowledge was conclusive. It seems to me that the decision went on the basis that the absence of actual knowledge was not conclusive and that circumstances might give rise to a duty to enquire; but that, in fact, the circumstances did not impose such a duty in that case. The judgment also seems to me to indicate that what occurs in the normal course of properly conducted business consistent with its unobjectionable operation does not put on enquiry. It is not enough that such normal occurrence is compatible with improper operation too.

The knowledge required to hold a stranger liable as constructive trustee in a dishonest and fraudulent design, is knowledge of circumstances which would indicate to an honest, reasonable man that such a design was being committed or would put him on enquiry, which the stranger failed to make, whether it was being committed. Acts in the circumstances normal in the honest conduct of affairs do not indicate such a misapplication, though compatible with it; and answers to enquiries are prima facie to be presumed to be honest, an aspect of the law which I shall deal with more fully later when considering negligence.

I come to the third element (82), "dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees". I have already indicated my view, for reasons already given, that this must be understood in accordance with equitable principles for equitable relief.

I therefore cannot accept the suggestion that, because an action is not of such a dishonest and fraudulent nature as to amount to some crime, that it is not fraudulent and dishonest in the eyes of equity—or that an intention eventually to restore or give value for property—which it was suggested might provide a good defence to a criminal charge—would of itself make its appropriation and use in the meantime, with its attendant risks and deprivation of the true owner,

A unobjectionable in equity, and thus make what would otherwise be dishonest and fraudulent free from such objection.

It was suggested for the plaintiff company that "fraudulent" imports the element of loss into what is dishonest, so that the phrase means dishonest resulting in loss to the claimant. It seems to me unnecessary and, indeed, undesirable to attempt to define "dishonest and fraudulent design", since a definition in vacuo, without the advantage of all the circumstances that might occur in cases that might come before the court, might be to restrict their scope by definition without regard to, and in ignorance of, circumstances which should patently come within them. The words themselves are not terms of art and are not taken from a statute or other document demanding construction. They are used in a judgment as the expression and indication of an equitable principle and not in a document as constituting or demanding verbal application and, therefore, definition. They are to be understood "according to the plain principles of a court of equity" to which SIR RICHARD KINDERSLEY, V.-C., referred (83), and these principles, in this context at any rate, are just plain, ordinary commonsense. I accept that "dishonest and fraudulent", so understood, is certainly conduct which is morally reprehensible; but what is morally reprehensible is best left open to identification and not to be confined by definition.

4. Paying bank's liability to its customer in negligence.

A further and alternative claim is made against the defendant banks for negligence. This is a claim for damages at common law, as contrasted with a claim for equitable relief against the banks, as well as against other defendants, to replace moneys misapplied as trustees or constructive trustees. Both these equitable and common law claims, as against both defendant banks, involve the allegations that they ought to have made enquiry. Such allegations, though differing in the case of each bank, are identical under both the equitable and the common law claim, and it is common ground that any standard of care which puts on enquiry or notice is the same under both claims. Whereas the claim in equity against the banks is made against them as constructive trustees, the claim against them in common law is based, as stated in para. 27 of the statement of claim, on "the duty which as bankers they respectively owed to the [plaintiff company] as their customer".

The relationship of banker to customer with regard to the customer's current account in credit at the bank is not that of trustee or fiduciary to a beneficiary but sounds in contract (see Foley v. Hill (84), and N. Joachimson (a firm name) v. Swiss Bank Corpn. (85), per ATKIN, L.J.). In Jarvis v. Moy, Davies, Smith, Vandervell & Co. (86), GREEK, L.J., stated:

"... where the breach of duty alleged arises out of a liability independently of the personal obligation undertaken by contract, it is tort, and it may be tort even though there may happen to be a contract between the parties, if the duty in fact arises independently of that contract. Breach of contract occurs where that which is complained of is a breach of duty arising out of the obligations undertaken by the contract."

Although it was suggested that, in this case, para. 27 of the statement of claim alleging negligence is wide enough to cover negligence both in tort and contract, the negligence with which we are concerned, being negligence in the duty owed to the plaintiff company as the bank's customer, is negligence "arising out of the obligations undertaken by the contract" between the bank and its customer and is, in my view, clearly negligence in contract. The claim by the plaintiff company in equity is as a beneficiary in a fund of which it is alleged the director defendants are trustees, and against other defendants treated in equity as constructive trustees; but the claim in common law against the banks is by the plaintiff company as itself a customer of the banks. It contrasts with any claim which a beneficiary under a settlement trust might make, where the customer is the trustee and not the beneficiary and the account is not in the name of the beneficiary at all but of the trustee. The allegations against the defendant banks are exclusively as paying banks and not as collecting banks—for negligence in paying out the plaintiff company's money from its bank account. The question, therefore, is: is there any and, if so what, liability of a bank in negligence in contract between a paying bank and its customer? Nevertheless as the authorities referred to deal with both paying and collecting banks, I will deal first with a bank's obligations in general, both with regard to paying and collecting, so far as they are relevant to this case and the authorities.

It might be convenient to indicate first certain matters which are elementary. A cheque (as a bill of exchange drawn on the banker payable on demand) is transferred by delivery or endorsement and delivery. Delivery means transfer of possession. When a cheque is delivered to the payee he becomes the holder of it and may negotiate it by presenting it for payment or endorsing it over to a third party, who may similarly endorse it, and so on. If the endorsee gives value for the cheque, he becomes holder for value and if, in addition, he takes it bona fide without notice of any defect of title, he becomes holder in due course and his title is unassailable despite prior defect. The person for the time being entitled to the property in and possession of a cheque, as against all other claimants, is its true owner. Anyone entitled to immediate possession of a cheque may sue for conversion and the measure of damages is the face value of the cheque. Alternatively, a plaintiff may waive the tort and claim the proceeds of the cheque as money had and received to his use. (See BYLES ON LAW OF BILLS OF EXCHANGE (22nd Edn.) pp. 267, 295, 296.)

Section 60 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. (87), provides protection for a paying bank and s. 82 for a collecting bank (88). The protection given by s. 60 is to a paying banker who pays "in good faith and in the ordinary course of business", though negligent. The protection to a collecting banker is to a banker who collects not just "in the ordinary course of business" but "in good faith and without negligence". Section 60 reads as follows:

"When a bill payable to order on demand is drawn on a banker, and the banker on whom it is drawn pays the bill in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, it is not incumbent on the banker to show that the indorsement of the payee or any subsequent indorsement was made by or under the authority of the person whose indorsement it purports to be, and the banker is deemed to have paid the bill in due course, although such indorsement has been forged or made without authority."

On this the text book (BYLES ON LAWS OF BILLS OF EXCHANGE (22nd Edn.)) comments at pp. 268, 269:

"This provision protects only the banker on whom the bill or cheque is drawn: it does not protect a collecting banker. Its object is to protect the paying banker against forged or unauthorised indorsements. Hence it applies to an indorsement by an agent in fraud of his principal. Where, however, the paying banker fails to exact a proper indorsement and pays upon an indorsement which is irregular, he is not protected by this section: nor is he protected where the bill or cheque is materially altered, since the instrument has been avoided by the alteration and he is under no duty to pay it. . . . Negligence is clearly not incompatible with good faith, and an act which is done negligently may yet be done in the ordinary course of business."

(87) for s. 60, see 2 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 538.

(88) For s. 82, see 2 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 547.

A Section 82 reads as follows:

“Where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title or a defective title thereto, the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment.”

B Section 80 provides (89) further protection to a paying bank on whom a crossed cheque is drawn and who pays to a banker. This is not limited to protection in respect of endorsements like s. 60, but it does require a more stringent standard from the banker than s. 60, namely, payment “in good faith and without negligence” and not just “in good faith and in the ordinary course of business”.

C Section 80 reads:

“Where the banker, on whom a crossed cheque is drawn, in good faith and without negligence pays it, if crossed generally, to a banker, and if crossed specially, to the banker to whom it is crossed, or his agent for collection being a banker, the banker paying the cheque, and, if the cheque has come into the hands of the payee, the drawer, shall respectively be entitled to the same rights and be placed in the same position as if payment of the cheque had been made to the true owner thereof.”

D The relationship between customer and banker is contractual and founded on one contract, which normally includes the relationship of creditor and debtor with regard to the balance in the customer's bank account and the relationship of principal and agent in respect of the payment of the customer's cheques drawn on the customer's bank account. This appears clearly from LORD ATKINSON's speech in Westminster Bank, Ltd. v. Hilton (90) and ATKIN, L.J.'s famous judgment in N. Joachimson (a firm name) v. Swiss Bank Corpn. (91). LORD ATKINSON said, in Westminster Bank, Ltd. v. Hilton (92):

E “It is well established that the normal relation between a banker and his customer is that of debtor and creditor, but it is equally well established that quoad the drawing and payment of the customer's cheques as against money of the customer's in the banker's hands the relation is that of principal and agent. The cheque is an order of the principal's addressed to the agent to pay out of the principal's money in the agent's hands the amount of the cheque to the payee thereof.”

F G ATKIN, L.J., in Joachimson's case (93), said:

“The question seems to turn upon the terms of the contract made between banker and customer in ordinary course of business when a current account is opened by the bank. It is said on the one hand, that it is a simple contract of loan; it is admitted that there is added, or superadded, an obligation of the bank to honour the customer's drafts to any amount not exceeding the credit balance at any material time, but it is contended that this added obligation does not affect the main contract. The bank has borrowed the money and is under the ordinary obligation of a borrower to repay. The lender can sue for his debt whenever he pleases. I am unable to accept this contention. I think that there is only one contract made between the bank and its customer. The terms of that contract involve obligations on both sides and require careful statement. They appear upon consideration to include the following provisions. The bank undertakes to receive money and to collect bills for its customer's account. The proceeds so received are not to be held in trust for the customer, but the bank borrows the proceeds and undertakes to repay them. The promise to repay is to repay at the branch of the bank where the account is kept, and during banking hours. It includes a promise to repay any part of the amount due against the written order of the customer addressed to the bank at the branch, and as such written orders may be outstanding in the ordinary course of business for two or three days, it is a term of the contract that the bank will not cease to do business with the customer except upon reasonable notice. The customer on his part undertakes to exercise reasonable care in executing his written orders so as not to mislead the bank or to facilitate forgery. I think it is necessarily a term of such contract that the bank is not liable to pay the customer the full amount of his balance until he demands payment from the bank at the branch at which the current account is kept. Whether he must demand it in writing it is not necessary now to determine."

The Joachimson case (94) turned, in the special circumstances of that case, on whether the customers had a cause of action against the bank on Aug. 1, 1914. As no demand was made by the customers for payment by the bank of the amount standing to the credit of their account with the bank, that depended on whether demand by a customer was necessary to a cause of action by a customer against a bank for money lent.

Although the case was concerned with this limited point, it was suggested that the passage quoted from ATKIN, L.J., was intended as a comprehensive statement of the law on the contract between customer and banker and that, therefore, as it did not mention a duty of care by banker to customer there is no such duty of care, the more so as it mentions a duty of care by customer to banker. It would, indeed, seem to me rash, in the absence of compelling considerations, to ascribe, particularly to such a judge as ATKIN, L.J., such a very risky and cramping intention. BANKES, L.J., in a judgment preceding ATKIN, L.J., had (95), rejected a somewhat similar submission that Foley v. Hill (96) should be treated as making an exhaustive definition of the obligations arising out of the relations of banker and customer. True, ATKIN, L.J., in his judgment said (97), "The terms of that contract involve obligations on both sides and require careful statement." It was therefore suggested that he was making a careful statement of all the terms; but he did not say "comprehensive" statement, and his "careful statement" was that "they appear upon consideration to include the following provisions". The defendants say that, in the careful statement, the word "includes" means "consist of". This, however, would rob the statement of the carefulness relied on to make it comprehensive. It seems to me that ATKIN, L.J., is dealing with the mutual obligations of banker and customer, from receipt of moneys into the customer's account until payment out of the account, so far as they throw light on the question to be decided, namely, whether demand was required before payment. That is why he concludes the relevant passage by saying: "I think it is necessarily a term of such contract that the bank is not liable to pay the customer . . . until he demands payment." What is "such contract" is shown by what he had mentioned earlier, including the obligation of the bank not to cease to do business with the customer, except on reasonable notice; and the obligation of the customer to take reasonable care in executing his written orders. That is why he mentioned what he did mention earlier.

Five years later, the same court was dealing with the duty of care of a paying bank in the case of Hilton v. Westminster Bank, Ltd. (98). ATKIN, L.J., said (99), with reference to the plaintiff's instructions to the defendant:

"I think it is the duty of the bank, arising out of the contract to exercise

A reasonable care and skill in dealing with the communications which the customer sends to them in relation to his banking business."

BANKES, L.J., in referring to the relationship between banker and customer, said (100) that it is

"to a large extent regulated by statute, but . . . in essence it is a contractual relationship which involves, I think, the duty on the bank to take reasonable care in the carrying out for its customer of its customer's business."

In the House of Lords (101), the Court of Appeal was reversed, but on inference of fact and not on these statements of law. On the contrary, the speeches of the House of Lords were on the footing that there was a duty to take care. To avoid a possible source of confusion which threatened before me, it may be convenient to mention here that ATKIN, L.J., makes it perfectly clear (102) that this is not contrary to, but in addition to, the rule in Ireland v. Livingston (103) that an agent, acting honestly on a possible interpretation of ambiguous instructions, cannot be held responsible for so acting.

The Hilton case (101) turned on the stopping of a cheque. The drawing of a cheque and the stopping of a cheque are both instructions to a banker. The banker's obligations with regard to his customer's instructions are the same whether they be to pay or to stop (though subject, of course, to the difference in the substance of the instructions given). There seems no ground for saying that the duty of care applies to instructions to stop but not to instructions to pay, or vice versa. Certainly no such ground has been suggested. Thus LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE (104) referred to the duty of a bank to honour a cheque drawn on a customer's account up to the amount of the customer's credit, and said:

"This duty is ended, and on the contrary when the cheque is stopped another duty arises, namely, to refuse payment."

LORD DUNEDIN said (105):

"It must always be remembered that a bank can be sued just as much for failing to honour a cheque as for cashing a cheque that had been stopped," and, of course, vice versa. The facts in that case, so far as we need be concerned with them, were as follows (106). On Aug. 1 the bank received a telegram purporting to be signed by a customer directing "Stop payment of cheque 117283 amount of £8 ls. 6d. to Poate". On Aug. 2 the customer telephoned the bank branch cashier and the conversation included the following: "Did you get my wire to stop cheque to Poate for £8 ls. 6d.?" "Yes, it has not been presented yet, Mr. Hilton", to which Hilton, the customer, replied: "It is not due to be presented till today", or perhaps, "It is not presentable until today". This telephone conversation authenticated the telegram and so disposed of any question that might have arisen whether the telegram came from the plaintiff. The telegram, taken on its own and thus authenticated, provided perfectly clear instructions.

The telephone conversation, however, went beyond authentication and referred to the cheques being presented or presentable "until today" Aug. 2. The Court of Appeal (107) concluded that the inference from the reference to Aug. 2 was that the cheque was post-dated Aug. 2. From this conclusion it followed that, when on Aug. 6 a cheque arrived at the bank, drawn by the same customer for the same amount to the same payee and also dated Aug. 2, but numbered 117285, instead of 117283, reasonable care on the part of the bank would have required that the bank should check whether number 117283 had been paid. If they had exercised that care they would have found that it was the number of another cheque that had already been paid on July 29; and that therefore the telegram could not have been intended to refer to 117283 but must have been intended to refer to 117285, with the result that the bank should not have paid cheque 117285. In fact, the bank did pay it, and the Court of Appeal held that, in accordance with their inference about Aug. 2, the bank was liable to the customer for damages for negligence. A

The House of Lords (108), however, on the other hand, concluded that the telephone conversation did not indicate that the cheque was post-dated, and that therefore the cheque 117285, being later in numerical order of the cheque than 117283 and being dated Aug. 2 after the cancellation on Aug. 1 of a cheque already drawn (and which on the House of Lord's view, the bank was not told was post-dated), the supposition was that it was a later duplicate cheque. So, in the view of the House of Lords, there was no breach of the bank's duty to take care, not because there was no such duty to take care but because there had not been a breach of it. On the existence of the duty, the House of Lords did not gainsay what was said by the Court of Appeal. They proceeded on the Court of Appeal view of the law, even though HORRIDGE, J., at first instance had, as LORD DUNEDIN said (109), "exonerated the bank on the simple ground that 117283 was stopped and 117285 was cashed". If the instructions were conclusive and there was no duty of care, then it seems to me that HORRIDGE, J., was necessarily right. B

Further, LORD DUNEDIN indicated that the duty of care that arose was not limited to checking the accuracy of instructions, when a doubt arose about their expression or meaning, but went beyond that to exercising care that the apparent instructions were in reality the instructions of the customer. LORD DUNEDIN said (109): C

"I was at one time inclined to think that, inasmuch as both the cashier and the manager knew that there was a stop on a cheque they ought, on Aug. 6, to have made certain investigations, but I find that they did do so. They followed the ordinary practice. They looked at the ledger and the ledger showed that no cheque in favour of Poate had come in. I think, therefore, that the view of the officials was correct that the cheque presented being subsequent to the date of the stop instructions might be a duplicate cheque and that they were bound to cash it." D

Here it was the mere existence of a stop on a cheque, without regard to any ambiguity in expression, that imposed the obligation to take care by investigation that there was no duplication of payment. This was in keeping with the bank's duty of care, as stated by BANKES, L.J., and ATKIN, L.J., in the passages quoted (110). E

Curtice v. London, City and Midland Bank, Ltd. (111), referred to in judgments of BANKES and WARRINGTON, L.J.J., in the Hilton case (112), was also a case of stopping a cheque. The issues in the Curtice (111) case were, whether a cheque could be countermanded by telegram and whether it had in fact been so countermanded. The telegram was placed in the bank's letter box which, by oversight, was not cleared until after the cheque had been paid. It was held that the cheque was not countermanded within the meaning of s. 75 of the Act of 1882 (113) which provides that F

"The duty and authority of a banker to pay a cheque drawn on him by his customer are determined by (1) countermand of payment . . ." G

- A The placing of the telegram in the letter box did not, by constructive notice, constitute a countermand, when in fact there was none. SIR HERBERT COZENS-HARDY, M.R., said (114): "There is no such thing as a constructive countermand in a commercial transaction of this kind", and FLETCHER MOULTON and FARWELL, L.J.J., agreed; but all the members of the court made it perfectly clear that these observations, so far from being related to a claim in negligence, were supplemented by statements that the appropriate course was to claim in damages for negligence, instead of for money had and received, on the ground that the cheque was constructively countermanded. FARWELL, L.J., said (115):

"On the evidence here it is clear that the banker is simply put on inquiry by the receipt of a telegram, and his duty is not to pay at once, but to make inquiries . . ."

- C FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., said (116):

"It must be a question in each case as to whether the agent has behaved reasonably in acting or not acting upon that telegram."

Moreover COZENS-HARDY, M.R., said (117):

- D "A telegram may, reasonably and in the ordinary course of business, be acted upon by the bank, at least to the extent of postponing the honouring of the cheque until further inquiry can be made. But I am not satisfied that the bank is bound as a matter of law to accept an unauthenticated telegram as sufficient authority for the serious step of refusing to pay a cheque."

- E So this case likewise, in my view, goes to indicate that the bank has a duty of care to its customer in respect of the conduct of its customer's business as BANKES, L.J., said and not merely in interpreting its customer's instructions; that that duty may in the circumstances require that the bank should make enquiries before acting and for that purpose to postpone honouring the customer's cheque; and that the test of care required in the performance of the bank's duty is an objective test of reasonableness.

- F Bellamy v. Marjoribanks (120), a case before the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, gave the banks statutory protection, also dealt with the duty of care of a paying bank. The plaintiff drew a cheque on Coutts & Co., payable to one Geary or bearer, and crossed it "Bank of England for the account of the Accountant General". Geary crossed out the crossing to the Bank of England and wrote instead the name of his own bankers "Gosling & Co.". The amount of the cheque was paid by Coutts & Co. to Gosling & Co. and Geary was thus enabled to mis-apply the cheque. The plaintiff sued his bankers in negligence for paying the cheque to Gosling and not to the Bank of England. It was decided that the crossing was not part of the drawer's instructions so as to make the cheque payable to the Bank of England only, but that it was, by bankers' usage, a protection for the plaintiff, a design to secure payment through a bank so that "in the event of a banker paying a crossed cheque otherwise than through a banker (121) the circumstance of his so paying would be strong evidence of negligence in an action against him". This case was not decided on the ground that the customer's instructions were the bank's only concern and, once ascertained, were conclusive, or on the ground that the care required of the bank was limited to care in interpreting the customer's instructions. Payment, despite the crossing and the usage, was "strong evidence", but not more than evidence, of negligence. It was not treated as disobedience of instructions. The relevance of the decision is its ratio decidendi; and the decision was based on a duty of care on the part of the paying bank to protect the plaintiff, its customer. There was, it seems to me, a clear recognition of such a duty of care, even though it may be arguable that the decision might have been founded, as it was not, and perhaps even better founded, on observance by the bank of an instruction of the customer by crossing, which, truly interpreted, required payment through any bank.

In Carpenters' Co. v. British Mutual Banking Co., Ltd. (122) MAC KINNON, L.J. (who dissented, but only because he, unlike his brethren, considered that the court was bound by previous decision) said (123):

"... the banker does owe a duty of care to his customer; they are in a contractual relation."

Then he comments (123) that s. 60 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, in relief of a paying bank, merely requires that the bank should have paid "in the ordinary course of business", and not, as in s. 82 in relief of a collecting bank, "without negligence". He adds (123) that, if in s. 60 "without negligence" had been intended,

"... seeing that the paying banker already owes a duty of carefulness to his customer, it would have been the more obvious to express it."

For the banks it was suggested that this merely referred to a duty to take care not to pay otherwise than in accordance with the instructions. I do not read MAC KINNON, L.J.'s observations in the limited way for which the banks contend. SLESSER, L.J. (124), treated circumstances which put on inquiry, coupled with the absence of inquiry, as establishing negligence within s. 82.

B. Liggett (Liverpool), Ltd. v. Barclays Bank, Ltd. (125) was referred to. As the law turned on the Royal British Bank v. Turquand (126) case, with which we are not concerned, and the circumstances of negligence were far removed from the circumstances in our transactions, it does not seem to be of material assistance.

The cases on the duty of care of paying banks are very few. For the defendant banks, it was suggested that this indicated that there was no duty of care on paying banks. Not only is such a negative indication dangerous, but it seems to me that, to conclude that there is no duty of care on paying banks, is contrary to the quotations which I have made from paying bank cases. For the plaintiff company, it was suggested with considerable force that there were good practical reasons why customers should not choose to sue the paying banks, including in particular that it was less onerous to sue the collecting bank. The customer could sue the collecting bank in conversion, in which the burden in a defence under s. 82 of establishing absence of negligence would lie on the bank; whereas if the customer sued the paying bank in negligence, the burden of establishing negligence would lie on the customer. The paying bank might be able to rely on s. 60, which exonerates a bank acting in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, although negligent.

The collecting bank cases referred to were relied on by the plaintiff company, as I have mentioned, merely as providing an indication of circumstances constituting carelessness and of the standard of care required.

In Midland Bank, Ltd. v. Reckitt (127), Lord Terrington was authorised by power of attorney to draw cheques on the account of a client at Barclays Bank for his client's purposes, signed such cheques as his client's attorney, and paid them into his own account at the Midland Bank in reduction of his overdraft. The headnote states the decision (128):

LORD ATKIN (129) quoted LORD CARSON in a similar case involving Lord Terrington, which is the case of Reckitt v. Barnett, Pembroke and Slater, Ltd. (130), and LORD ATKIN said:

- C "LORD CARSON shortly states the conclusion of all the members of the House when he says [and he quotes LORD CARSON (131)] 'It is clear (i) that the cheque was used to liquidate the private debt of Lord Terrington, (ii) that the defendants knew it was so used, and (iii) that the form of the cheque gave them notice that the money was not the money of Lord Terrington. In that state of circumstances there is no evidence or any possible inference which can be drawn that the agent was applying his principal's money in discharge of any possible liability of his principal'."

Then LORD ATKIN added (129): "Precisely the same state of things exists here." Then LORD ATKIN added (132):

- E "It seems to me clear that in an omission of an ordinary business precaution, in breach of a plain duty imposed upon a creditor to take reasonable care to see that a known agent paying his own debt to his creditor out of his principal's money is acting within his authority, the bank were negligent in making no inquiry as to their customer's authority to make these payments; . . ."

Later LORD ATKIN said (133):

- F "... the notice found to exist defeats reliance on ostensible equally with with actual authority. Neither in the one case nor in the other can the agent be assumed to have authority to pay his own debts with his principal's money."

In Permanent Estates, Ltd. v. National Provincial Bank, Ltd. (134), the first paragraph of the headnote reads (134):

- G "The plaintiffs were the payees of a cheque, crossed 'and Co. Not negotiable', received by a firm of surveyors on their behalf from the War Damage Commission. An employee of that firm, having forged the plaintiffs' endorsement, asked B. to cash the cheque. B. took the cheque to A., a solicitor, who had a clients' account with the defendant bank. A. paid the cheque into the clients' account, having met the bank's objections by stating that he had arranged for cheques from the War Damage Commission to be paid into his clients' account, whereupon he sent his clients his cheque for the amount less his fees. Having discovered the employee's fraudulent conduct, a partner of the firm sent the plaintiffs his cheque for the amount of the commission's cheque."
- H

- I The action against the bank was in conversion by it as collecting bank and the bank relied on s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. The only question was, whether the bank had established that it had acted without negligence within that section, that is, without carelessness towards the plaintiff, the payee, who was the true owner of the cheque. With regard to the plaintiff, the bank owed no contractual duty, but to succeed under s. 82 it had to establish that it acted "without negligence" with regard to the plaintiff. MACKINNON, L.J., sitting in the King's Bench Division, said (135):

"It is difficult to enunciate any principle which is applicable to the infinite variety of circumstances in which such a question might arise. There are obviously various considerations: the name of the payee; the form of the endorsement; the circumstances of the customer himself. In this case the customer was a solicitor. True, there is reason to believe that he was not a very reputable solicitor; but he was a solicitor, and he was keeping, under statutory conditions, a clients' account, and it would be natural that he should be paying into such an account the money of people other than himself. He himself presented the cheque, so that there was no question, as there has been in other cases, of negotiating a cheque for a person known to be a servant of the true owner of the cheque. It is true that, in the light of after events, the explanations given by Addis may sound improbable to anyone in a suspicious frame of mind; but in my opinion the officials of the bank, doing their duty under s. 82, have not to be abnormally suspicious. Moneys must be paid out, among a multiplicity of other transactions, with reasonable despatch. As it turns out, there were a good many questions on which a lawyer, who is trained very differently from a bank clerk, would probably have had it in mind to cross-examine Addis."

So there are an "infinite variety of circumstances" that may be relevant to negligence. "Reasonable despatch" in this passage must, of course, mean reasonable in all the circumstances. It is accepted that, in the ordinary course of business, the decision what course to take with regard to a cheque presented for payment must be taken on the day of its receipt by the bank branch responsible for the decision. It seems to me, however, that a banker is not compelled at his risk to honour or dishonour his customer's cheque, in the ordinary course, by the end of the day of its receipt, if there are circumstances requiring investigation. The need for despatch and the knowledge of the banker are alike elements which enter into a decision what despatch and what investigation are reasonable in the circumstances.

In A. L. Underwood, Ltd. v. Bank of Liverpool and Martins Bank (136), so far as material, cheques were drawn in favour of a company, endorsed by a sole director duly authorised to endorse the company's cheques, and paid by him wrongly into his private account in the defendant bank. The company sued the defendant as collecting bank for conversion, and the bank relied on s. 82. The issue was whether the bank had established under that section that it acted "without negligence", that is, without carelessness in relation to the company, the true owner of the cheque. It was decided that the bank had not so acted without negligence and was therefore liable in conversion to the plaintiff. BANKES, L.J., said (137):

"They [that is, the cheques] were indorsed by Underwood as sole director, a fact which, instead of absolving the cashiers from inquiry, appears to me to demand the exercise of greater caution on their part, having regard to the fact that the cheques were being paid into Underwood's private account."

So, although as stated (137), Underwood clearly had authority, as sole director, to endorse cheques, this certainly did not conclude the matter in the bank's favour.

ATKIN, L.J., quoted the cross-examination of the bank manager. He said (138):

"Later the witness was asked this: 'It would be negligence on the part of the bank to collect for a customer's private account cheques made

A payable to his principal. Do you agree with that? A.—Yes: without asking the principal first—without referring to the principal’.”

SCRUTTON, L.J.’s judgment (139) contains observations to the same effect. Later, the cross-examination continued (140):

B “Q.—I put it that there is a risk that he is, or may be doing wrong? [that is, the payer-in]. A.—Yes. Q.—I think you will agree with me that at all events such a transaction, that is to say, the payment to the private account of the official of the company of a cheque which, on the face of it, is made payable to the company, is out of the ordinary course of business? A.—Yes.”

Then ATKIN, L.J., continued his own observations (140):

C “These admissions, fortified by the whole facts of the case, appear to demonstrate that in disposing of the cheques as he did Underwood was not acting within the ordinary scope of his authority, but was doing something unusual which ought to have attracted the attention of the bank’s servants.”

D This passage suggests that where a transaction is “out of the ordinary course of business”, “doing something unusual which ought to have attracted the attention of the bank’s servants”, and where there is “a risk” that wrong is being done (to someone with regard to whom the bank seeks to maintain that it is acting without negligence), then the bank is negligent unless it makes enquiry.

E It is irrelevant to the passages which I have quoted, that the negligence of the bank to the true owner of the cheque was imposed by statute and did not arise out of contract, or that such negligence is not a ground of claim but a defence in which, under s. 82, the burden of proof lay on the bank, instead of on the plaintiff as in contract. Nor is it relevant that the negligence being considered is that of a collecting and not of a paying bank. The passages are not directed to or affected by the considerations which are irrelevant to them. They are directed to what constitutes carelessness within the legal context of negligence, what kind of behaviour amounts to negligence. They show, to my mind, that the standard of care being considered is not some mystery peculiar to banking law, still less that it is limited to collecting banks. That case does not appear to me to be a pronouncement for banks, and still less for collecting banks, of some peculiar standard of care; but the application to a bank of the approach, tests, and standard of care prevailing generally in the law of contract.

G Morison v. London County and Westminster Bank, Ltd. (141), was a case relied on by the defendants. In that case, one Abbott had authority to draw on the plaintiff’s account at the National Provincial Bank and sign cheques “per pro”, for the purposes of the plaintiff’s business. Over the years, he paid in cheques, so signed, into his own account with the defendant bank. The plaintiff sued the defendant, as collecting bank, for damages for conversion, or alternatively for money had and received. It appears (particularly from the observations of PHILLIMORE, L.J. (142)) that, in reply to the claim in conversion, the defendant relied on s. 82 (including its collection being without negligence) and, in reply to the claim for money had and received, on the cheques being forgeries and therefore nullities.

H The forgery relied on was what was called “statutory forgery” under s. 25 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (143). That section provides:

I “A signature by procuration operates as notice that the agent has but a limited authority to sign, and the principal is only bound by such signature if the agent in so signing was acting within the actual limits of his authority.”

It was held that the misuse of his authority by a person authorised to sign “per pro" and who so signed, was not a forgery; that with regard to cheques collected in later years, there was no negligence because the bank had collected similar cheques in earlier years without protest from the plaintiff; and that, with regard to cheques in the earlier years, the plaintiff had in the circumstances ratified Abbott's acts. A

Two series of observations in the course of the case, it was suggested, bear on our problem, one series on the position of the paying bank, and the other on negligence. As no claim was made against the paying bank, the observations with regard to it were, at the highest, obiter. Even so, it seems to me that they were not made with any reference to the paying bank's liability in negligence at all, since no suggestion of negligence was made against the paying bank. LORD READING, C.J., said with reference to the forgery issue (144): B

"If, as is admitted, the National Provincial Bank were entitled, and indeed bound to honour cheques so signed . . ." C

He also said (145):

"The plaintiff makes no complaint against the National Provincial Bank.

It is clear that they were bound in pursuance of the directions and authority given in 1888 to honour the said cheques on his account." D

BUCKLEY, L.J., spoke to the same effect (146). These statements must be read in the context of that case, where there was no claim in negligence or otherwise against the paying bank, or any such ground suggested for impugning the bank's relying on the mandate to it. They were not general pronouncements of law, which would exclude such claims in negligence or otherwise, and so to read them would import into them a significance to which the court's mind was not directed at all and which they were never intended to bear. On negligence LORD READING, C.J., said (147): E

"For a firm to pay salary or commission or any debt to a manager by cheques made payable to the firm or order, and for a manager to pay cheques so drawn to his own private banking account after himself indorsing them as agent for the payees, appear to me transactions so out of the ordinary course that they ought to have aroused doubts in the defendants' mind and caused them to make inquiry." F

PHILLMORE, L.J., said (148):

"Abbott was a customer of the collecting bank, well recommended, no doubt, but known to be an employee and a manager; and, being a manager and having the power of signing per pro. for his employer, he was placing cheques which he drew for his employer to his private account. If this happened often enough, and with regard to sufficiently large sums, I think it ought to give rise to some suspicion in the breast of the bank manager or the cashier. If it were material, I do not think that I should be prepared to dissent from the conclusion to which, I think, the learned judge intended to arrive—that there was negligence in cashing some of the earlier cheques, cashing them and paying them to Abbott's account without, at least, some inquiry. But as regards all the middle and later cheques, a suspicion which might have been reasonably entertained would with at least equal reason be lulled to sleep." G

- A “It is never possible to lay down a rule as to what constitutes negligence and what avoids it. Each case depends on its own facts.”

He then quoted LORD DUNEDIN (150), quoting ISAACS, J. (151) in the High Court of Australia referring to the Morison (152) case as laying down that

- B “. . . the test of negligence is whether the transaction of paying in any given cheque was so out of the ordinary course that it ought to have aroused doubts in the bankers' mind, and caused them to make inquiry,” with LORD DUNEDIN's comment (153):

- C “If there be inserted after the words ‘given cheque’ the words ‘coupled with the circumstances antecedent and present’, their lordships think this is an accurate statement of the law. The question is necessarily a question of fact.”

- D “‘It follows that, being a question of fact, it is really impossible to lay down rules or statements which will determine what is negligence and what is not. Each case must be determined on its own circumstances. In view, however, of what was said in the decision of the High Court of Australia above mentioned, their lordships feel bound to say that they cannot agree with the view of the learned Chief Justice in that case where he says that the care to be taken is not less than a man invited to purchase or cash such a cheque for himself might reasonably be expected to take. This seems to their lordships to apply an inapposite standard, for the simple reason that it is no part of the business or ordinary practice of individuals to cash cheques which are offered to them, whereas it is part of the ordinary business or practice of a bank to collect cheques for their customers. If, therefore, a standard is sought, it must be the standard to be derived from the ordinary practice of bankers, not individuals.’”

- E So it seems to me that the standard of care is that which bankers might reasonably be expected to take according to the ordinary practice of bankers. The test thus seems clearly to be an objective test of reasonableness.

- F These quotations are in line with other cases, already considered, indicating that, in deciding whether there is carelessness in breach of the required standard of care, and whether enquiry ought to be made, and there is negligence, all the circumstances have to be considered, including the extent to which the transaction appears “out of the ordinary course”.

- G One of the relevant circumstances in assessing the degree of the care required is stated by SELLERS, L.J., in Orbit Mining & Trading Co., Ltd. v. Westminster Bank, Ltd. (156). He said:

- H “It is not our way of life either in trade or banking or in private relationships to be always on the alert against dishonesty.”

- This is in line with part of a passage, already quoted from the Penmount Estates case (157), that under s. 82 the bank officials “have not to be abnormally suspicious”.

- Muchryde v. Eukyu* (158), in line with SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R.'s observations in Jones v. Williams (159), a case already referred to, states that when, on enquiry, an answer is received which the enquirer may reasonably believe to be true, he is entitled to act on it. A

If enquiry ought to be made, and no enquiry is made, then the weight of authority establishes, in my view, that it is to be assumed that a true answer would be given; and, if no enquiry is made, that negligence is established. DEVLIN, J., in Baker v. Barclays Bank, Ltd. (160) stated, obiter, in the case of a defence under s. 82, where the burden of proving collection without negligence lay on the defendant bank, that B

"... there is at the very least, a heavy burden on him to show that such inquiries could not have led to any action which could have protected the interests of the true owner..."

Earlier, however, he referred (161) to statements of LORD WRIGHT and GREER, L.J., in Lloyds Bank, Ltd. v. E. B. Savory & Co. (162) to the effect that it is no answer to negligence to say that an enquiry would have been fruitless; and to the statement of SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., in Jones v. Williams (163), quoted by BANKES, L.J., in A. L. Underwood, Ltd. v. Bank of Liverpool (164), that it is no answer to say that a false answer would have been given. SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R.'s statement, at any rate, was not limited to s. 82, but was clearly based on general principle, which BANKES, L.J., adopted and applied to s. 82. The weight of authority does not seem to me to be in accord with the limited qualification to which DEVLIN, J., guardedly referred. C D

Banking law is not a separate body of law, though, like innumerable other activities, it has statutory provisions dealing exclusively with it, and, being a distinctive and important activity, text-books dealing separately with it. Those aspects of law with which we are at present concerned are aspects of the general law of contract applicable to banking. The principles of that law of contract applicable to banking are the principles of the general law of contract. It seems to me that it is in keeping with this that ATKIN, L.J., in Hilton v. Westminster Bank, Ltd. (165), said, in a passage already quoted, that it is the duty of the bank to exercise "reasonable care and skill", that being a duty which he describes as "arising out of the contract" between banker and customer. E F

It seems to me that the passages quoted, in particular from ATKIN and BANKES, L.J.J., in Hilton v. Westminster Bank, Ltd. (166) are in keeping with this appreciation. To my mind, in accordance with those quotations, a bank has a duty under its contract with its customer to exercise "reasonable care and skill" in carrying out its part with regard to operations within its contract with its customer. The standard of that reasonable care and skill is an objective standard applicable to bankers. Whether or not it has been attained in any particular case has to be decided in the light of all the relevant facts, which can vary almost infinitely. The relevant considerations include the prima facie assumption that men are honest, the practice of bankers, the very limited time in which banks have to decide what course to take with regard to a cheque presented for payment without risking liability for delay, and the extent to which an operation is unusual or out of the ordinary course of business. An operation which is reasonably consonant with the normal conduct of business (such as payment by a stockbroker into his account of proceeds of sale of his client's shares) of necessity does not suggest that it is out of the ordinary course of business. If "reasonable care and skill" is brought to the consideration of such an operation, it clearly does not call for any intervention by the bank. What intervention is appropriate in that exercise G H I

A of reasonable care and skill again depends on circumstances. Where it is to enquire, then failure to make enquiry is not excused by the conviction that the enquiry would be futile, or that the answer would be false.

It was submitted for the defendants that where, as here, in the ordinary way, a company by a board resolution authorises persons to sign cheques on its behalf and provides that cheques so signed "shall be valid and binding on the company"

B and that the resolution shall be communicated to the bank and continue in force between the company and the bank until terminated as specified, then the bank is only concerned that the cheques should be signed by the authorised persons. If this were so then it seems to follow that, even if the bank actually knew that the authorised signatories were misapplying the company's funds, it could nevertheless rely on the signatures. This could be so outrageous as to lie outside

C the intention and true construction of the mandate. The mandate does not give the authorised persons' signatures any more conclusive effect than, in the case of an individual's account, a mandate gives the signature of that individual's duly authorised attorney as, for example, in Madland Bank, Ltd. v. Reckitt (167), to which I have referred. The mandate is to enable the signatories to sign "on behalf of the company" and bind it vis-à-vis the bank. Clearly the signa-

D tories, because they were authorised to sign "on behalf of the company", could not rely on the mandate to pay for their own purposes. In reality, they would be signing on their own behalf. Nor could the bank rely on the mandate as conclusive to make such payment for the signatories' purposes out of the company's account. Neither the signatories nor the bank would, in my view, be excused by the mandate from any obligation which existed independent of the mandate, such as

E obligations under their respective contractual relations with the company. As between the company and the bank, the mandate, in my view, operates within the normal contractual relationships of customer and banker and does not exclude them. These relationships include the normal obligation of using reasonable skill and care; and that duty, on the part of the bank, of using reasonable skill and care, is a duty owed to the other party to the contract, the customer, who in this

F case is the plaintiff company, and not to the authorised signatories. Moreover, it extends over the whole range of banking business within that contract. So the duty of skill and care applies to interpreting, ascertaining, and acting in accordance with the instructions of a customer; and that must mean his really intended instructions as contrasted with the instructions to act on signatures misused to defeat the customer's real intentions. Of course, omnia praesumuntur rite esse

G acta, and a bank should normally act in accordance with the mandate—but not if reasonable skill and care indicate a different course.

These conclusions are inconsistent with the acceptance of the submissions for the defendants that (i) a paying bank is concerned exclusively with the mandate from its customer and has no duty of care, or alternatively (ii) the bank is only liable otherwise (a) if it actually knew that a cheque is drawn by a mandated agent

H in breach of his authority, or alternatively (b) if from facts in the actual knowledge of the bank, the irresistible inference is that the cheque is so drawn. I mention the second alternative specifically because it is wished to keep it open.

CASES AGAINST THE DEFENDANTS SEPARATELY

I now come to the cases against the defendants separately, dealing first with the cases against them in respect of the first transaction and afterwards with the cases against them in respect of the second transaction. It was emphasised for the defendants that there must be defects in recollection by reason of the long time that had passed since these transactions took place. The investigations by the Board of Trade inspectors and the collapse of the Cradock and Burden companies took place, however, shortly after the second transaction. It would be surprising if, in all the circumstances, the events of the first and second transactions were not deeply impressed on the minds of those taking principal parts in them.

Allowance certainly has to be made for forgetfulness, particularly of the less salient events, but not to an extent that makes it a significantly exceptional feature of this case, compared with other cases in these courts. A

FIRST TRANSACTION DEFENDANTS

With regard to the first transaction it will be convenient to deal first with the defendant Mr. Cradock; then with the defendants Mr. Barlow-Lawson and Mr. Jacob, directors of the plaintiff company under Mr. Cradock's control; then with Contanglo, agent for Mr. Cradock in the first transaction; then with the District Bank; and finally with Woodstock. B

The first defendant, Mr. Cradock.

As I have said, Mr. Cradock is in default of defence, and there is a motion for judgment against him. So all I am concerned with, as against Mr. Cradock, is whether treating the statement of claim as admitted against him, the claim which it makes against him is established in law. That I will deal with after this judgment and in conjunction with the form of any order against other defendants. C

That the alleged purpose of using the plaintiff company's funds was to finance the purchase of stock in the plaintiff company by Mr. Cradock has to be established as against the other defendants. Not by default of Mr. Cradock's defence but positively. D

The plaintiff company, Woodstock and District agree that if any payment was made out of the plaintiff company's account for the purpose of purchasing the plaintiff company's shares, it was £232,500 and not merely the £195,000 paid to Contanglo. As the claim against Contanglo is limited to the £195,000, Contanglo is not concerned with this discrepancy in amount. It is likewise agreed between the plaintiff company, Woodstock and District that there should be an inquiry whether any part of the £232,500 so paid was in fact applied for the plaintiff company's purposes, and, if so, that the amount so applied be deducted from the amount of any liability in respect of such payment of the £232,500. Mr. Barlow-Lawson and Mr. Jacob did not dissent from this course, though an opportunity was given to them to consider their attitude. The course suggested seems to me correct and convenient. E F

As against Woodstock, Mr. Cradock's purpose of using the plaintiff company's moneys indirectly to finance his purchase of stock in the plaintiff company is established by Mr. Sarsfield's letter of Apr. 23, 1958, which I have already quoted in full. It was to achieve that purpose that the £232,500 was paid by cheque from the plaintiff company to Woodstock and endorsed over to Mr. Cradock. Mr. Cradock was already bound by his agreement with Contanglo, whose main provisions I have already stated, to pay the completion price for the stock, which turned out to be £195,000. The transfer of the plaintiff company's funds from National to District and a cheque for £232,500 paid into Mr. Cradock's account to cover the debiting of the District draft for £195,000 to Contanglo, as appears from Mr. Cradock's telephone conversation on Apr. 23 with Mr. McMinn and his and Mr. Sarsfield's conversations with Mr. Reynolds at the beginning of the meeting of Apr. 25, as I have mentioned, and the passage of the amounts through the District Bank with the documentation which I have mentioned, clearly establish Mr. Cradock's purpose and, together with Mr. Sarsfield's letter of Apr. 23, his arrangement with Woodstock to misapply the £232,500 of the plaintiff company's money to finance the purchase by Mr. Cradock of the stock in the plaintiff company. Contanglo accepts that Mr. Cradock's purpose in obtaining the £232,500 was to purchase stock in the plaintiff company and that, unless Mr. Cradock intended to transfer assets of corresponding value to the plaintiff company at the time of or immediately after his acquisition of the stock, it was a dishonest purpose. Although Mr. Cradock wanted a shell company with liquid assets, with which it could acquire some of his properties, no specific property was mentioned at the time of the first transaction. We know that Mr. Cradock did not intend at the time of his receipt of the £232,500 to transfer such assets G H I

A in return for such use by him of the plaintiff company's moneys, because he did not do so. Nor did he later do so or attempt to do so. It is a question of law whether any intention or contemplation that Mr. Cradock may have had to use the plaintiff company at some future time to be recipient of assets of his could be regarded as making honest what would otherwise be dishonest in any relevant sense, and with that I have already dealt and I have concluded that it cannot.

B The fifth and sixth defendants, Mr. Barlow-Lawson and Mr. Jacob.

The allegation against Mr. Barlow-Lawson and Mr. Jacob is that they procured that the £232,500 of the plaintiff company's money should be misapplied for the purpose of financing stock in the plaintiff company by Mr. Cradock, in bad faith and in breach of their duties as directors and as part of an arrangement between them, Mr. Cradock, Contango, District and Woodstock or some of such defendants to which the others were privy. They both deny that they were aware that the plaintiff company's money was to be used for such a purpose.

C Mr. Barlow-Lawson had a small engineering business and had before the war been an estate agent in partnership with Mr. Scott of Contango. He gave the impression of being somewhat flamboyant and happy-go-lucky. He repeatedly stressed that he was chairman of a successful company that had been a shell company. He was very easy in manner but not a person of any weight and not comparable in ability or force of personality with such controllers of operations as Mr. Burden or Mr. Scott, whom I saw or, by all accounts, of Mr. Cradock or Mr. Levinson, whom, of course, I did not see. In this case there is a very distinct division both of function and calibre between the controllers and the controlled.

D Mr. Barlow-Lawson was in both respects unmistakably one of the controlled. In his evidence he tried to be truthful and, though he had a marked inclination to create a high opinion of himself, he was apt to come out with the truth when pressed.

E He said that he regarded going on the board of the plaintiff company as a "splendid opportunity" to be a director of a public company. When pressed, however, he agreed that Mr. Scott had asked him to take the same sort of part as he had done on Mr. Levinson's invitation in another take-over, when his directorship lasted three days; and that there was no "splendid opportunity" without the possibility of his remaining on the board. This arose only when Mr. Cradock asked him on Apr. 25, just before the board meeting of that day, to be a director. He later said that he went on the board as nominee of Contango and as a "friendly gesture" to Mr. Scott. He later said what he got out of it was "personal", that he owed money to Contango and so was "under obligation to do this sort of thing". It was Mr. Scott who introduced Mr. Barlow-Lawson to Mr. Cradock. Mr. Barlow-Lawson agreed that he was on the board as nominee, first of Contango and then of Mr. Cradock, and that he was going to do what Mr. Scott or Mr. Cradock told him to do and not to do what they did not tell him to do. He knew that Mr. Cradock was taking over the plaintiff company.

F He authorised the transfer of the plaintiff company's moneys on deposit to Woodstock at eight per cent. without security and without any enquiry about Woodstock. He said: "I was quite happy to do what I was told to do by the virtual owner of the company", and added "because I obviously would have thought that he would not have invested the company's money in something where it would be lost". Later, he added: "He said it was alright, yes, and I naturally took his word, not only was he a respectable sort of bloke, in my opinion, quite wealthy but also the owner of the company". He recognised that, after he became Mr. Cradock's nominee, he gave no service to any in the company except Mr. Cradock. He said that Mr. Cradock probably thought he would sign a cheque for any amount in favour of anybody if he asked him to do so, and that he was right to think so. He admitted that he was "simply . . . the hands and eyes of Mr. Cradock". With regard to the meeting of Apr. 25 he said: "I did not really know what was happening and what was the intention of any of the parties . . . I trusted everybody there". A

Mr. Jacob was an employee of Mr. Cradock and his companies. He was engaged in managing properties and was paid by those companies £2,500 a year less P.A.Y.E., plus the use of a car and expenses. He was a quieter and abler man than Mr. Barlow-Lawson and, doubtless, was an able administrator. He did not give the impression of being an adventurer and he was not of the calibre of the controllers. His evidence, doubtless largely due to failure of recollection, was not such that much confidence can be placed in it. He knew that Mr. Cradock was purchasing a controlling interest in the plaintiff company, that he wanted a shell company with liquid assets with which he could acquire some of his properties; but no specific properties were mentioned for such acquisition at the time of the first transaction. He knew on Apr. 25, or on the day before, that he was going to be a director of the plaintiff company, and he was told, before the meeting on that day, that the plaintiff company's money would be deposited with Woodstock to earn a higher rate of interest. B C

He denied that Mr. Cradock talked to him about Mr. Sarsfield's letter of Apr. 23. He said he did not talk to him about that kind of personal matter, though he did mostly show him letters dealing with property matters. This is consistent with the picture which has emerged of Mr. Cradock in the course of the evidence. It seems to me that Mr. Cradock was not a person to confide more than necessary in those whom he used as his instruments. Mr. Barlow-Lawson and Mr. Jacob were not expert advisers or controllers of the operation. There was no reason why Mr. Cradock should tell Mr. Barlow-Lawson and Mr. Jacob that he was going to use the company's moneys to pay for the stock. He was astute enough, and there were obviously good reasons for his not informing them of his conduct when he need not do so. D E

It was suggested that Mr. Jacob must have gathered at the meeting of Apr. 25 that Mr. Cradock was going to use the £232,500 cheque to pay for the stock. Of course Mr. Jacob, like Mr. Barlow-Lawson, knew that Mr. Cradock was assuming control of the plaintiff company on Apr. 25, through acquiring controlling interest in its stock; and they both knew that the plaintiff company's funds were going to Woodstock under the cheque which they signed. At the documentation phase of the meeting, when Mr. Jacob signed the cheque, he said Mr. Sarsfield stood behind him, Mr. Barlow-Lawson described the room as "very, very small". It is clear undisputed evidence that no effort at secrecy was apparent in the endorsement of the cheque by Mr. Sarsfield to Mr. Cradock and the handing of it to Mr. Reynolds and the preparation of the accompanying papers for Mr. Reynolds for payment through District. I am invited to conclude that it was inconceivable that Mr. Jacob did not appreciate that the plaintiff company's money was in effect being transferred to Mr. Cradock, and if so that it was for use for payment for Mr. Cradock's acquisition of the stock. I think there is very great force in the submission and it has troubled me; but on balance I am not satisfied that it is established. F G H

Mr. Jacob said that he was told by Mr. Cradock that he was going to be a director of the plaintiff company and that his moneys and that of the plaintiff company's were to be transferred to Woodstock and that he realised that that would involve a resolution of the directors, including himself. He said that he voted for the resolution and the removal of the plaintiff company's account from National to District because Mr. Cradock wanted that. He made no enquiries about the resolutions and never considered the interests of other shareholders than Mr. Cradock, but did what Mr. Cradock, the majority shareholder, asked him to do. He said that, if Mr. Cradock acted honestly, the arrangement was honest, if dishonest it was dishonest, but that there seemed nothing wrong with it, within his knowledge at the time, and that he relied on Mr. Sarsfield, to whose company the cheque was being paid, whom he had met I

A casually once and knew to be a stockbroker. Moreover Mr. Jacob did later buy a small holding of stock in the plaintiff company for himself.

It seems to me, however, that both Mr. Barlow-Lawson and Mr. Jacob were nominated as directors of the plaintiff company to do exactly as they were told by Mr. Cradock, and that that is in fact what they did. They exercised no discretion or volition of their own and they behaved in utter disregard of their duties as directors to the general body of stockholders or creditors or anyone but Mr. Cradock. They put themselves in his hands, not as their agent or adviser, but as their controller. They were puppets which had no movement apart from the strings and those strings were manipulated by Mr. Cradock. They were voices without any mind but that of Mr. Cradock; and with that mind they are fixed in accordance with the view which I have already expressed on the law. They doubtless hoped for the best but risked the worst; and that worst has befallen them.

The claim against Contanglo is in equity as constructive trustee to replace with interest at five per cent. per annum a sum of £195,322 5s. 2d. of the plaintiff's moneys applied in furtherance of an arrangement between Contanglo, Mr. Cradock, the directors, Woodstock and District (or some of them to which the other were privy) in giving financial assistance in connexion with the purchase by Mr. Cradock of stock in the plaintiff company and for Mr. Cradock's benefit, in discharging Mr. Cradock's liability to Contanglo in respect of such purchase, and which amount, being or representing the plaintiff company's moneys, was received by Contanglo knowing that it was so misapplied. The liability to replace the £195,322 5s. 2d. is not disputed, provided that it is established that Contanglo is liable as constructive trustee as claimed. This liability is disputed, however, on the ground, inter alia, that Contanglo is not within the requirements to make it a constructive trustee of those moneys.

The first question that arose was whether the £195,000 received by Contanglo was moneys of the plaintiff company, or sufficiently represented those moneys, as to be the proper subject for such a claim in equity to replace them, as is made by the plaintiff company. This is a question of mixed fact and law.

The draft for £195,000 to Contanglo was drawn by District Oxford Street Branch on the District London office on Apr. 24. That draft was handed over to Contanglo at the beginning of the meeting of Apr. 25. As Mr. McMinn acknowledged, District was committed to meeting it, since it would not contemplate dishonouring its draft. Nevertheless, it had not in fact then been honoured and paid. It was debited to Mr. Cradock's account with District on the same day, Apr. 25.

As we have seen, however, Mr. McMinn as manager of the Oxford Street branch, had the draft so drawn only on the assurance that there would be a draft from National to Mr. Cradock for about £235,000 to cover it. Mr. Reynolds only parted with the draft to Contanglo on the assurance of Mr. Cradock that National would transfer the plaintiff company's credit in its National bank account to its account with District and the assurance of Mr. Sarsfield, in line with his arrangement with Mr. Cradock, that a cheque drawn on the plaintiff company's account with District, in Woodstock's favour, would be endorsed to Mr. Cradock. This scheme was carried out by the necessary resolutions of the plaintiff company's board and by payment of £232,764 from the plaintiff company's account at National to the plaintiff company's account with District and £232,500, out of it, by endorsement into Cradock's account, as I have described. It is completely clear that it was only by this use of the plaintiff company's £232,500 that the £195,000 payment was effected.

Of course, the credit in a bank account is not a total of specific or even floating coins, which are the property of the person whose account it is, but the amount of a debt payable by the bank to the customer in accordance with their agreement. Money paid into a bank account becomes the property of the bank. So the £195,000, even if debited to Mr. Cradock's account and credited to Contango's account after the £232,500 were credited to Mr. Cradock's account, would not be moneys of the plaintiff company, in the strict sense which I have indicated. It was or represented, however, moneys of the plaintiff company in the sense that it was the plaintiff company's moneys paid into its account and out of its account into Mr. Cradock's account that alone covered and enabled the £195,000 to be paid out of Mr. Cradock's account to Contango. No plaintiff company's moneys, no payment to Contango. It was the credit to Mr. Cradock's account of the £232,500 debited to the plaintiff company's account, that enabled the £195,000 to be debited to Mr. Cradock's account and paid to Contango. It is not, in my view, tenable that misapplication by cheque, debiting and crediting to bank accounts, instead of by coin, would prevent there being a misapplication of what would otherwise be a misapplication with liability to replace the amount misapplied.

It has never been suggested that Woodstock's part in this conversion of a plaintiff £235,000 debit into a Mr. Cradock £235,000 credit contributed any cover, backing, or substance to what Mr. Cradock received and which he, through the District draft, paid to Contango. It seems to me that any relationship of creditor and debtor that arose between Woodstock and Mr. Cradock is no more significant than such relationship between the plaintiff company and District and between District and Mr. Cradock. Where there is one operation to pass, and which does pass, all the benefit of A's fund to B, then if that one operation is a misapplication of that fund, it seems to me that A's claim to have that fund replaced is not to be defeated by the incidental legal relationships that arise in the course of that passage. The claim is a claim of substance, founded in equity, which fastens on the conscience of the recipient. The substance is that A's fund passes to B, in circumstances in which equity says B is liable to replace it. Neither substance nor conscience is affected by the incidental legal relationships that arise in the course of that passage, nor has that been suggested. Different considerations would arise where the fund passes from A to B by a series of disconnected incidents. Where, however, the passage of A's fund to B is designed and takes effect as one operation, equity is not to be defeated by the twists and turns and devious course which that one designed operation pursues. Any indebtedness of Woodstock to the plaintiff company, or of Mr. Cradock to Woodstock, that might arise in the course of that operation, does not, indeed ex hypothesi does not, make the operation less a single operation for the passage of the fund from A to B. Such indebtedness would be subsidiary to that operation. It would be a method of achieving, though obscuring it. To say that such indebtedness should in equity prevail over such operation would be to make what is subsidiary paramount; and nonetheless if A's fund passing to B is read as the benefit of the bank's indebtedness to A passing so as to be transformed, to the accompaniment of legal incidents, into the bank's indebtedness to B. Such wizardry is not to defeat equity.

So I conclude that £195,000 received by Contango were moneys of the plaintiff company or, at any rate, sufficiently represented those moneys as to be the proper subject for such a claim in equity to replace them as is made by the plaintiff company.

It was suggested that the payment of the £195,000 to Contango was not for its benefit. Contango itself took every conceivable precaution to secure its payment. That is what the elaborate security arrangements which it had exacted from Mr. Cradock were for. It appeared that the loss to Contango on a winding-up of the plaintiff company would be several thousand pounds, although Contango might well have been able to obtain a better price for the stock than Mr. Cradock paid for it. The payment to Contango secured for it, however, without further doubt or risk, money to pay the accepting stockholders to whom

A it was immediately liable and its £7,500 profit. I have no difficulty in concluding that the payment was to Contango's benefit.

The question then arises whether Contango participated in the operation of misapplying such moneys of the plaintiff company for the purpose of paying for the stock in the plaintiff company bought by Mr. Cradock or knew that the payment to them for the stock was of such moneys and in breach of trust.

B Mr. Scott who, as he said, was in control of the first transaction for Contango with the assistance of Mr. Levinson, denied such participation or knowledge, and there is no direct evidence, though there is circumstantial evidence relied on, to the contrary. The credibility and reliability of witnesses and the true assessment of their evidence, and particularly of Mr. Scott, thus becomes crucial. Mr. Scott, with Mr. Levinson and a Mr. Essex, had acquired a fifty per cent. shareholding in Contango. Mr. Scott and Mr. Levinson were active in carrying on Contango's business, which included the conduct of take-overs. Neither C Mr. Scott nor Mr. Levinson appeared as directors of Contango. Mr. Scott just preferred not to do so, except for a short period when he could not get anyone else as director instead of him. Mr. Meaden, who with Mr. Barlow-Lawson became Contango nominee in the plaintiff company for a day, was a director of D Contango. Mr. Scott was well versed in take-overs, including the take-overs of shell companies. This was not a man, perhaps like some others whom I have seen in this case, paddling or drowning in unfamiliar waters. He was extremely astute, most quick and agile minded, generally, though by no means invariably, aware of the implications of the questions put to him, and on occasion, in difficulty, apt to fence and adjust his answers. His evidence has to be approached with E the utmost caution.

It was Mr. Scott who introduced Mr. Cradock to Contango and who suggested to Mr. Cradock the purchase of the controlling interest in the plaintiff company to him. Mr. Scott was thus both the originator of the purchase and the person who, with Mr. Levinson's assistance, conducted it for Mr. Cradock. It appears from his evidence that the shell was required for injecting properties of Mr. F Cradock into it; and there is no suggestion of any other legitimate purpose why Mr. Cradock should require it. There is thus, the origin of the purchase at Contango's suggestion, the Contango control of the purchase for Mr. Cradock, the Contango knowledge of its purpose, and Contango's business as bankers or financial experts and their expert knowledge of conducting take-overs. Mr. Scott denies, however, any participation or knowledge of how Mr. Cradock was G to provide the money to pay for the stock.

The normal method of providing such money was by bridging finance, the temporary loan from a banker to pay for the shares pending the sale of the H taker-over's properties to the company for payment, which would enable him to repay the bank loan. For a taker over to provide the payment for the shares out of his own moneys would be extremely unlikely. Mr. Scott himself said he could not "ever recollect" such a case. Such a taker-over, though a reputed I millionaire like Mr. Cradock, would hardly be expected to keep the amounts required for such payment unemployed, particularly when he was to be paid for properties to be sold to the company and the profits on which were to be realised by the sale of the shares which he had acquired, the realisation of those profits, free of tax by sale of the shares, was, as explained, the object of the operation. So the payment by the company to the taker-over for the properties would be of a substantial amount, of the order of the price paid for the shares. So if the taker over had properties to inject into the company, they would be available as securities for bridging finance. Such a method of financing the purchase of the shares would be free from objection.

It might even be, at any rate theoretically, conceivable to arrange for the payment for the shares, and the sale of the taker-over's properties to the company, to take place on the same occasion, in such circumstances as to dispense with the need for bridging finance. The evidence of Mr. Coombes, a stockbroker called as a take-over expert by Contanglo, was, however, that "the idea that you could have everything sewn up and pop in everything in that same afternoon I think is quite impracticable". It might be convenient, if such purchasers of shares and properties could take place on the same occasion, to have the accounts of the company and of the take-over at the same branch of the same bank. The crucial factor is whether the payment of the company's moneys is in consideration for the sale of the properties. A B

If the taker-over has no properties to inject, on the occasion of his payment for the shares, and cannot provide bridging finance, then a way in which he can pay for the shares is by getting the company's money into an account at his own bank, and getting it transferred to himself to cover payment by him for the shares. Mr. Coombes said: "The acquisition of companies with their own assets is a commonplace." He added later that if there were a lapse of time between the purchase of shares and the injection of the assets, "in one way or another how it would work" would be for "the company's moneys in the meantime to be used to provide the purchase price of the shares"; and that the difference between later injecting and never injecting the properties into the company was the difference between an honest man and a crook. Such, at any rate, was the differentiation in the view of an expert in these take-over practices. The danger of using the company's moneys to pay for the shares, without a prior or concurrent injection of properties, was a familiar danger present to the mind of take-over practitioners. So was the danger of an assurance, without security, that properties would be injected later, with the well-recognised risk that they never might be. C D

In our case there is no question of any security or assurance that properties would be injected. What Contanglo say is that they had no knowledge of and were not concerned about the source for payment of the stock at all. As I have said, the only legitimate purpose suggested for the acquisition of the stock was injection of properties with a view to realisation of the profits on them tax free. Contanglo does not suggest, however, that it enquired whether Mr. Cradock was going to inject properties into the plaintiff company on the occasion of his paying Contanglo and taking over the company on Apr. 25. The plaintiff company's board would have had to provide for payment of its moneys in return for the properties. That board, until after the £195,000 draft was handed over and, according to Mr. Scott himself, taken away from the meeting, consisted of the Contanglo nominees. They had passed no resolution to purchase Mr. Cradock properties, nor was there any suggestion that such properties had been identified or valued, or that in any way any preparation had been made or even considered for payment of the plaintiff company's moneys for such properties. Contanglo also knew that the new Cradock-nominated board could not have given any such consideration, or made any such preparation, because one of its members was Mr. Barlow-Lawson who had been one of their nominees, until he became a Cradock nominee on Mr. Cradock's invitation that same morning when Mr. Cradock took over from Contanglo. E F G H

This analysis, particularly in the light of Mr. Coombe's evidence, indicates strongly to my mind that Contanglo, with Mr. Scott in control with Mr. Levinson's assistance, realised perfectly well that there was not to be any injection of properties into the plaintiff company immediately on the Cradock take-over. What would make this much more patently obvious, however, would be knowledge of Contanglo that the plaintiff company's moneys were on that very occasion being lent to Woodstock. Contanglo had ample opportunity to acquire that knowledge, but in its defence and by its representatives in the box it has denied having that knowledge. For reasons which appear later, this is a difficulty which I do not find it necessary to resolve. I

I now come to circumstances which, it is suggested, indicate positively that Contanglo completed the sale to Mr. Cradock, knowing that the plaintiff

A company's moneys were being used to pay for Mr. Cradock's acquisition of the stock.

It was put to Mr. Scott in cross-examination that the one way to make certain that the purchase of the shares was proper, without use of the company's money, would be "to make certain that the company's money was never touched until it came to be used as the purchase price of some property". Mr. Scott replied:

B "I agree". This part of the questioning was introduced by a suggestion that if one were taking over a company one could arrange for the company "to put the company's money into your bank" and thus find that, on telling the bank that one was going to borrow it, the bank would arrange for the payment of the accepting shareholders. The only present significance of the question is that it unmistakably clearly referred to a movement of the company's money from
C its own bank into the taker-over's bank. Further, the question and answer to which I first referred was followed almost immediately by the question:

"But if one is worried about the propriety of a shell operation and one finds that the company's money is moved as the very first step in the operation, then at any rate one would be suspicious?"

D The answer was: "Yes". "Q.—And rightly suspicious? A.—Yes". When hearing this cross-examination I had no doubt at all that counsel and Mr. Scott were in the first question and answer which I quoted referring to the movement of the company's money from one bank to another; that "never touched" was anything but a more emphatic way of saying "never moved" and certainly had no connotation of being "touched" in any sense of "touching" for a loan
E or as a transfer from the company. That that was the true view seems to me to be confirmed by a passage considerably later, towards the end of the cross-examination. Immediately after referring to the resolution to pay the plaintiff company's money from National to District, counsel referred to his earlier cross-examination, which I have mentioned, and said:

"I was asking you and you agreed with me that the one way to make F certain that the company's moneys were not improperly applied in financing the purchase of its shares was to make certain that the company's moneys were not moved, were not touched until the moment came to pay for the property being put into the company. A.—Absolutely, and that had always been made very clear to us by Mr. Levinson."

In re-examination, in referring to the first question of counsel for the plaintiff
G company which I quoted, Mr. Scott was asked:

"What did you understand him to mean when he talked about the company's money not being touched? A.—The company's money remains intact in the company's banking account."

This is consistent with the meaning of the cross-examination and reply which H it seemed to me they plainly bore. Then came, however, the crucial and significant question and answer:

"Do you consider it in that sense of the word touching the company's money if you move it from an account, shall we say with Lloyd's Bank, to an account in the National Provincial Bank?"

and the answer came: "That is exactly the same thing, as long as it was in
I a bank account". No objection was taken to that question, and perhaps wisely as it could not be taken until after it had been put. Despite the answer, I must make it unmistakably clear that I had no doubt that in cross-examination Mr. Scott was referring to a movement of the plaintiff company's account from one bank to another.

This conviction is in line with the answer of another take-over expert in cross-examination, namely, Mr. Coombes,

"Q.—Supposing you were acting on behalf of the purchaser of a shell company and you asked him how he was going to finance the purchase and he says, 'I am going to borrow the money from my bankers on completion day but it is essential that I have the company's moneys transferred to my bankers on the day of completion', what would be your view of that method of financing? A.—I would never do such a thing."

It is important to distinguish this from a transfer of the company's account after completion of a purchase, when it is clear that no question of use of the company's moneys to pay for the purchase arises. Such a transfer was what was effected by the original directors of the plaintiff company, when they transferred the plaintiff company's account from Barclays to National, after the bank had long since confirmed that Contango was in a position to pay accepting stockholders and after receipt of a letter from the bank that cheques were being sent to them.

I have referred to this evidence in detail because to my mind it establishes first the danger of the transfer of the plaintiff company's account from one bank to another, as from National to District in this case; secondly, Contango's knowledge of that danger; and thirdly, an example of Mr. Scott's qualities as a witness which I have mentioned, so far as they might be seen without the vivid impression which he conveyed in the box, and the advantage of the tones of the interchanges between counsel and witness.

There are two other matters to which I must refer. The first is a document headed with the plaintiff company's name and underneath "Financial position Apr. 22, 1958". It shows a calculation of the cost to Mr. Cradock of acquiring the stock, £195,322 5s. 2d. Underneath it shows the plaintiff company's assets namely, cash at bank, £191,292; tax reserves £5,403, Government securities £38,704, amounting to a total of £235,799, and assets in East, with which we have not been concerned, amounting only to just over £6,500, making the plaintiff company's total net assets £222,652 after deducting £19,688 liabilities. The total purchase price is then shown deducted from the plaintiff company's total assets, leaving roughly £27,330. This document was prepared at Mr. Scott's instigation. Mr. Meaden was concerned in its preparation for Contango and said, what is obvious on the face of it, that it showed the plaintiff company's net assets and the amount Mr. Cradock had to pay for the stock. It equally obviously showed (i) the amount of the purchase price deducted from the amount of the plaintiff company's net assets, and (ii) that the plaintiff company's cash at the bank was less than the purchase price. After some cross-examination of Mr. Scott on this document, there came the question with regard to the £27,000, balance of the plaintiff company's assets after deducting the purchase price of the stock in the plaintiff company:

"It is the difference between the net assets of the company and the cost of buying the shares? A.—Yes. Q.—So that it is what will be left in the net assets of the company after taking out of them the cost of buying the shares? A.—Yes."

In examination-in-chief, Mr. Scott had said that the purpose of the document was

"To show Mr. Cradock that after he had injected properties to the extent of the net assets of the [plaintiff company] which were about £222,000, he would then own £719,579 shares in Selangor and would be possessed of cash to the extent of approximately £27,000."

On the same day, Mr. Meaden wrote to the plaintiff company's secretaries, confirming a telephone conversation on that day, requesting a sale of the tax reserve certificates and of government securities and payment of the proceeds into the plaintiff company's account with National. The plaintiff company's money at the bank thus came to exceed the amount Mr. Cradock had to find to pay Contango for the acquisition of the stock.

It seems to me almost inescapable that this document was to show the extent to which the plaintiff company's assets exceeded the price of the shares and that

- A arrangements were made in the light of it to sell readily realisable assets so that the plaintiff company's cash at the bank would exceed the amount payable for the stock. Mr. Scott's explanation was that it was not left to Mr. Cradock to sell the securities after he had obtained control of the plaintiff company because "he was employing us as agents to do certain things and this was part of our service". Further his only explanation was that the document was not to show
- B what would be left of the plaintiff company's moneys after deduction of the purchase price of the stock, but was to show that he would have the stock and £27,000 cash after injecting properties to the value of the net assets of the plaintiff company. There is no reference in the document to any properties being injected at all, and still less to their value; and the document, on its face, does not go beyond deducting the cost of acquisition of the stock from the net assets. I am
- C satisfied, as I have explained, that the immediate injection of assets was not contemplated, and that Contanglo knew this perfectly well. The immediate sale of the plaintiff company's securities was, however, carried out by Contanglo, with the result that the plaintiff company had cash at the bank before payment by Mr. Cradock to Contanglo of an amount exceeding the amount of that payment, and that the plaintiff company's cash was moved by Contanglo from
- D National to Mr. Cradock's District branch. These observations are unaffected by the consideration relied on by counsel, though not in fact by Mr. Scott in his evidence, that in the event Mr. Cradock scooped £235,000 of the plaintiff's moneys which were virtually all its assets, and not its assets less liabilities shown on Contanglo's document. It seems to me that, taken in conjunction with Mr. Scott's explanation of it and the other evidence, the document weighs against Contanglo.
- E There was a great deal of evidence and argument directed to the question whether the Contanglo representatives, Mr. Scott, Mr. Levinson and Mr. Meaden left the meeting of Apr. 25 before the resolution of the plaintiff company's board to make a loan of £232,500 to Woodstock was passed. For the plaintiff company, however, it was stated that it was no part of its final submission to me that the Contanglo representatives left at any particular stage, or did not leave before the
- F resolution on the Woodstock loan. So I will deal with this question briefly. The original draft minutes, drawn up by the secretaries' representative, Mr. Ringshall, had shown them as leaving at the end of the meeting; but Mr. Ringshall was very confused by the proceedings. In his draft he arranged the items by subject-matter and not chronologically, and he altered them, most probably at Mr. Levinson's indirect instigation, to show that the representatives left before the Woodstock
- G resolution. Nobody else apparently made that complaint of the draft; but Mr. Ringshall says he would not have made the alteration if he thought it incorrect. The only direct evidence was that the Contanglo representatives left before the Woodstock resolution. This was the evidence of Mr. Scott, Mr. Meaden, Mr. Barlow-Lawson and Mr. Jacob, but it was too unsatisfactory to be reliable. Such evidence would, however, be in line with Mr. Coombe's evidence, on take-
- H over board meetings, that it would be normal for the Contanglo representatives to leave at that stage; and the Woodstock resolution did not appear on the agenda which Mr. Levinson prepared for the meeting. Indeed, if Contanglo knew otherwise of the Woodstock resolution, my impression is that its representatives would be sufficiently well advised to leave before it was reached. So the view which I favour is that the Contanglo representatives left before the
- I Woodstock resolution.

The transfer to District could well have been made by Mr. Cradock's nominees later than Apr. 25, or even at the meeting of Apr. 25, after the Contanglo representatives left. No innocent reason for its being made before they left has been sustained; but Mr. McMinn and Mr. Reynolds, although they hoped and were prepared for it, yet seem hardly to have expected it then. The resolution to transfer, however, would enable what otherwise would not be feasible, namely the plaintiff company's moneys to be used to cover the payment of the draft to Contanglo. Without cover for that draft Contanglo representatives could not expect to depart with it. Contango took every precaution to provide against Mr. Cradock failing to complete. As Mr. Scott said: A

"There is many a slip between the cup and the lip. We completed our transaction on [Apr. 24]. For some reason or other, unforeseen reason it may be, Mr. Cradock may not have been able to complete with us. Q.—You think the whole thing on the 25th might have gone off? A.—It could have done quite well." B

Mr. Scott also said that it was Mr. Cradock wanting the plaintiff company's money moved to District on [Apr. 25] and on the agenda for that day's meeting, that set his mind at rest and he knew that Mr. Cradock would be able to complete. Contango secured, through their nominees on the plaintiff company's board, that the resolution for that movement was passed. C

Contango knew the amount of money that Mr. Cradock had to find to pay for acquisition of the stock; that the plaintiff company's assets were liquid; that without the realisation of securities the plaintiff company's balance at the bank was less than the money it required to pay Contango for the stock; that the securities were substantially all realised and credited to the plaintiff company's account at National as Contango itself had provided, thus bringing the balance at the bank above the amount of the Contango draft for the stock; that Mr. Cradock had wanted the plaintiff company's moneys at National transferred to Martin's Bank and that he changed this and on Apr. 24 required it transferred to District, Oxford Street branch, on the morning of Apr. 25; that it then knew that Mr. Cradock would be able to complete; that it knew the danger of such a transfer resulting in the plaintiff company's moneys being used to finance the purchase of the shares in the plaintiff company; that it received a banker's draft on the morning of Apr. 25 for £195,000 for Mr. Cradock's acquisition of the stock; that the banker's draft was drawn on the District Bank; that, on the same occasion, and when Contango was still in control of the plaintiff company's board and knew that its draft was drawn on the District Bank, and before Contango representatives departed from the board with the draft, the plaintiff board in the presence of a District representative passed a resolution to transfer about £232,700 to the District, Oxford Street Branch: and after that Contango representatives departed with the £195,000 draft. All this in circumstances in which Contango knew, as I have concluded, that there was no contemporaneous or immediate injection of assets by Mr. Cradock into the plaintiff company. D E

From the evidence about take-over bids, in general, and their dangers; the analysis of the evidence on this first transaction; and my impression of the evidence, particularly of Mr. Scott; I am left at the end of the day convinced, without reasonable doubt, that Contango knew perfectly well that the plaintiff company's moneys were being used and misapplied to pay them the £195,000 for the acquisition by Mr. Cradock of stock in the plaintiff company, and participated in the operation of misapplying that money of the plaintiff company, knowing that such misapplication constituted a breach of trust. F G H

The claim against District is first, in equity as constructive trustee, to replace with interest at five per cent. £232,500 of the plaintiff company's money applied in furtherance of an arrangement between District, Mr. Cradock, Contango, the directors of the plaintiff company and Woodstock (or some of them to which the others were privy), not for the purposes or the benefit of the plaintiff company but for the purpose of giving financial assistance in connexion with the purchase by Mr. Cradock of stock in the plaintiff company, or alternatively with the knowledge which District had, by reason of particularised documents, or ought to have had as a reasonable banker by reason of the specified documents and knowledge of matters alleged in the statement of claim, of such application for the said purposes, and which sum District nevertheless paid and debited to the plaintiff company's account. The claim against District is further or alternatively for I

A damages for negligence in performance of the duty which, as bankers, they owed to the plaintiff company as their customer, in honouring a cheque for £232,500 drawn on the plaintiff company and debiting it to the plaintiff's account, without making any or sufficient enquiry of Mr. Barlow-Lawson, Mr. Jacob, Mr. Cradock and Mr. Sarstfield, or any of them, of the purpose for which the £232,500 was being paid to Mr. Cradock, by a cheque in favour of Woodstock, endorsed to B Mr. Cradock.

In the claim in equity against District, the allegation that District ought to have known the said purposes does not include any allegation that District ought to have made enquiries, because particulars given of the allegation that District ought to have known did not include any reference to enquiries. This contrasts with the claim of negligence against District, which includes the C allegation that District ought to have made enquiries of Mr. Barlow-Lawson and others as I have already mentioned. (It also, incidentally, contrasts with the claims against the Bank of Nova Scotia in equity and negligence, to which we shall come later, which both include allegations that enquiries ought to have been made). Therefore the allegation in equity against District, that District knew or ought to have known the said purposes, must be established by direct proof of D actual knowledge, by actual knowledge found by inference or, in accordance with particulars pleaded and the objective test which, in considering the law on constructive trustees, I have concluded applies, by proof of facts which would have brought home the knowledge to the mind of a reasonable banker. So if District knew, or the facts were such that a reasonable banker would have known, the said purposes, the plaintiff company (on proof of other essential allegations) E is entitled to succeed in equity and in negligence. If, however, the facts were such as only to put a reasonable banker on enquiry, then the plaintiff company would succeed (on proof of other essential allegations) in negligence but not in equity, simply because with regard to the plaintiff company's claim in equity reference to enquiry is not pleaded as part of the particulars provided by the plaintiff company.

The knowledge of District, with which we are concerned, admittedly includes F the knowledge of Mr. McMinn, the manager of the District Bank, Oxford Street branch. It also, in my view, clearly includes the knowledge of Mr. Reynolds, though it would appear that he did not have any substantial relevant knowledge which Mr. McMinn did not also have. It is true that the Oxford Street branch was a small branch consisting of only eight persons, and that it was completely inexperienced in take-overs. But it was a branch which, under the District G organisation, was empowered to deal with take-overs, even of the substantial and somewhat complex kind with which we are concerned in this case. Ignorance and inexperience of take-overs applied to Mr. McMinn equally with Mr. Reynolds and no more excludes Mr. Reynolds' knowledge than Mr. McMinn's knowledge from being the knowledge of the bank. Mr. Reynolds was not a page boy. He was second to Mr. McMinn, acting in Mr. McMinn's place in Mr. McMinn's absence, H and he went to the meeting of Apr. 25 as the bank's representative to handle the interchange of drafts and the opening of an account for the plaintiff company and obviously considered himself, without dispute by the bank, to have authority to accept the endorsed cheque in place of the banker's draft. Mr. Reynolds was a responsible official of the bank, whose knowledge, in my view, is clearly knowledge of the bank.

I It is not disputed by District that at the crucial moment of debiting the plaintiff company's account and crediting Mr. Cradock's account with the £232,500, the bank knew that the £232,500 came indirectly from the plaintiff company to Mr. Cradock. Nor do I understand it to be disputed, what is in any case clearly indisputable, that the £232,500 from the plaintiff company was cover for the £195,000 payment to Contango. As stated for District, "The only defence, therefore, is that they (that is, District) did not know that it was cover for the purchase of the shares by Mr. Cradock". Subject to this defence, District clearly assisted in the alleged misapplication of the plaintiff company's money. So, in the claim in equity, the question is—has it been established by direct evidence or inference from the evidence that the bank knew, or are facts established which would have brought it home to the mind of a reasonable banker, that the plaintiff company's £232,500 paid indirectly to Mr. Cradock was cover for the purchase of shares in the plaintiff company by Mr. Cradock?

In approaching the evidence, I bear in mind the passages already quoted from MACKINNON, L.J., in Penmount Estates, Ltd. v. National Provincial Bank, Ltd. (168) and SELLERS, L.J., in Orbit Moving & Trading Co. v. Westminster Bank, Ltd. (169), to the effect that the banker does not have to be abnormally suspicious or always on the alert against dishonesty, and PEARCE, L.J.'s observation in Archbalds (Freightage), Ltd. v. S. Spanglett, Ltd. (Randall, Third Party) (170):

“In so many cases of deception it is hard even for the persons deceived to imagine in retrospect how they could have made such a mistake, yet the fact remains that people are misled into foolish errors.”

Perhaps this last quotation cuts both ways in this case, but at any rate it seems to me a reflection on human behaviour which weighs in favour of foolishness rather than wickedness. I also bear in mind that Mr. McMinn, in the ordinary course of banking business, should decide on Apr. 25 whether to honour the plaintiff company's cheque to Woodstock, endorsed to Mr. Cradock, although he would be entitled to suspend payment, pending justifiable investigation.

Mr. McMinn and Mr. Reynolds are gentlemen very much, if I may be permitted a colloquialism, out of the same stable. They were both completely honest, conscientious, solid, reliable, slow without ability comparable to those whom I have referred to as controllers in these transactions, completely inexperienced in company take-overs or such transactions as we are concerned with in this case, both with admirable qualities for conducting the ordinary everyday banking business of the ordinary small bank branch office. Some of Mr. McMinn's answers were defensive, changeable and contradictory, but I am completely satisfied that this was not because he was in the least being unhelpful or trying to mislead, but because he was concerned not to commit himself or his bank by an answer which he had not adequately considered, and because in some parts of his evidence he was just thinking aloud to and around the answer as he went along. On occasion, however, he found that he had become involved in a defensive attitude from which he was too slow and tenacious to withdraw.

District first comes into the operations, with which we are concerned, on Apr. 23, 1958, when Mr. Cradock telephoned Mr. McMinn that he could “influence” the transfer to him of the account of the plaintiff company “in which he had been interested for some time”. Mr. McMinn replied that he would be interested in having the account. Mr. Cradock then asked Mr. McMinn to arrange a banker's draft for £195,322 5s. 2d. to Contango and for a District representative to take it to the National Bank on Apr. 25, where he would collect in exchange a banker's draft for about £235,000 in favour of Mr. Cradock. This arrangement about the drafts was confirmed by a letter to Mr. McMinn, signed by Mr. Cradock as “governing director”, without specifying of what company, but on notepaper headed with the Mr. Cradock group headquarters address. So, at that stage, Mr. McMinn knew that Mr. Cradock could influence the transfer of the plaintiff company's account from National to District and that the draft from District to Contango was to be covered by a draft to District, to be collected from National. Mr. McMinn denied that any other relevant information passed between him and Mr. Cradock and this, I have no doubt at all, was true. In particular there was no mention of the plaintiff company's moneys being used to cover the Contango draft or to pay for stock in the plaintiff company.

- A Mr. McMillin then instructed Mr. Reynolds to attend the meeting on Apr. 25 to exchange the drafts, and to be prepared for the possibility of a new company account being opened with their branch. Mr. Reynolds accordingly attended the meeting prepared to carry out this business. Mr. Reynolds said that amongst other documents he took a cheque or a cheque book with him. If it were a single cheque, he could not suggest any explanation for his doing so, when it was put to him that to take a single cheque would be explicable if it were to make a payment out of the plaintiff company's new account of virtually all the moneys paid into it, as by the cheque to Woodstock. The evidence was that no cheque book was debited to the plaintiff company's account until June 11, although there might well have been, by slip, a delay until this date in debiting a cheque book issued on Apr. 25. However, a cheque book was debited to Mr. Cradock's account on Apr. 25 and there is nothing to show whether or not the Woodstock cheque came from the book. All this goes to whether District knew before the meeting, at its lowest that one payment was to be made out of the plaintiff company's account immediately. I am satisfied that District did not know this. Certainly the Woodstock cheque, which is what the single cheque form would presumably be used for, took District completely by surprise.
- D When Mr. Cradock and Mr. Sarsfield had explained to Mr. Reynolds, at the meeting, that the plaintiff company's account would be transferred to District and that the plaintiff company would draw a cheque on District for £232,500 in favour of Woodstock as a loan, and that it would be endorsed by Woodstock as a loan by Woodstock to Mr. Cradock, and Mr. Reynolds had thereupon parted with the £195,000 draft in favour of Contango, the position was that (subject
- E to the signatures on the cheque, including the endorsement, being in order) the cheque would be as good as a draft, because the plaintiff company's balance at National would be transferred by a banker's draft from National to District. It introduced, however, two new features to District: (i) the plaintiff company's moneys were now the cover for the District draft, which Mr. Reynolds had parted with, and which was debited to Mr. Cradock's account; and (ii) whilst, in Mr.
- F Reynolds' view, the making of a loan by A to B and B to C was normal, to do so by endorsement was "most unusual"; and the endorsement would make the second loan of precisely the same amount as the first loan, unless it was part of a larger loan, which it was not suggested to Mr. Reynolds by Mr. Sarsfield or Mr. Cradock.

- G During the board meeting which followed, Mr. Reynolds was in the group apart from the board meeting group and had very little idea of what was going on. After that, he took part in the documentation with regard to the opening of the plaintiff company's account, including the receipt of the National drafts and the payment of the Woodstock cheque to Mr. Cradock's account. After the single cheque reference the next matter relied on, with regard to the claim against District, was the undertaking to District from National given to Mr. Reynolds. This was the
- H undertaking dated Apr. 25, 1958, signed by Mr. Snell and addressed to the District, Oxford Street branch manager, to deliver to him 713,579 stock units in the plaintiff company together with a completed transfer deed in favour of District Bank (London) Nominees, Ltd., "as soon as certain formalities of stamping and registration had been complied with". Mr. Reynolds' evidence was that it was given to him by a person whom he thought to be representative of National, as
- I he was about to leave the meeting. Mr. Reynolds agreed that the undertaking was given to him as being there on behalf of District's customer Mr. Cradock. Mr. Reynolds said that he may have read it but not carefully, that it came as a surprise to him, that it was a letter from one bank to another which called for no immediate action and so he asked no question about it. He denied that the explanation for his not asking was that he knew that the shares in the plaintiff company, referred to in the letter, were Mr. Cradock's shares, or that he knew before the undertaking that they were to be transferred to the District Bank (London) Nominees, Ltd. I do not find this behaviour of Mr. Reynolds odd.

He was slow and deliberate and engaged in take-over business which was strange to him. When he saw that the undertaking called for no immediate action and was from another bank it seems to me that the natural thing for such a person so placed was to do nothing but take it back with him for his bank manager to deal with. I accept this evidence of Mr. Reynolds; but this evidence means that District was informed, immediately after the transfer of the plaintiff company's account by Mr. Cradock's influence to District and payment out of the plaintiff company's account of a large sum indirectly to Mr. Cradock, that this large holding in the plaintiff company was to be transferred to District nominees without the beneficial owner being named, when the only person for whom District was acting with regard to the plaintiff company was Mr. Cradock; that National gave District an undertaking, without District ever having asked for it, to make the transfer; and that it was given to Mr. Reynolds as being present on behalf of District's customer Mr. Cradock. Moreover this information to District, obtained in the setting of the operations described on Apr. 25, followed on the information which District already had of those operations.

When Mr. Reynolds reported back to Mr. McMinn, Mr. McMinn said that his account was confused, which accords with Mr. Reynolds' own evidence of his recollection of the board meeting part of the proceedings at the National Bank. Mr. McMinn was, however, "horrified" because Mr. Reynolds brought back, instead of the banker's draft in favour of Mr. Cradock, a cheque in favour of Woodstock endorsed by Mr. Sarsfield to Mr. Cradock, when he had already parted with the District draft to Contango which District was bound to honour. Mr. McMinn was concerned, because if the endorsement was not in order, District might be held liable for conversion. So, as I have explained, he set about and eventually obtained proper confirmation of the endorsement. As Mr. Reynolds said, there was what he described as "the fixation on the endorsement". The branch had bank instructions about conversion of cheques and the dangers of endorsements. They had no such instructions about the dangers of payments, if in accordance with a mandate to the bank; and Mr. Reynolds had been told that the endorsed cheque represented a loan by the plaintiff company to Woodstock and by Woodstock to Mr. Cradock and that loan, Mr. McMinn said, was "in his mind". So I have no difficulty in believing that these two conscientious bank officials went, if I may so describe it, flat out in blinkers for endorsement with hardly a glance for anything else. Mr. McMinn said that when he saw the undertaking he did not connect it with the draft in favour of Contango and that he was mystified by the undertaking and decided to wait to hear further on completion of the formalities of stamping and registration mentioned in the undertaking. This is very much a repetition of Mr. Reynolds' behaviour when he received the undertaking, and to my mind it is equally in character, but Mr. McMinn, despite his slowness and inexperience, agreed in cross-examination that he knew that the undertaking must have something to do with the events of the meeting.

Various documents were relied on by District as indicating that Mr. McMinn did not realise on Apr. 25 that Mr. Cradock was purchaser of the stock in the plaintiff company. I have found these documents of very little assistance. I will, however, refer, though briefly in the circumstances, to the principal of these documents. On May 13, Mr. McMinn wrote to Mr. Snell recording that Mr. Snell said that he was unable to give information who the beneficial owner of the stock was, and that he had "been in touch with our customer", meaning Mr. Cradock, to arrange for National to give the information. On the same day Contango wrote to National that the shares were held to the order of Mr. Cradock; and on May 14 National wrote to Mr. McMinn that they were instructed by their principal Contango that the shares were to be so held. It seems to me that, as the stock was delivered to District by National, it was from National that the information should come who was the beneficial owner and only on the instructions of the

- A principal for whom National held the stock, namely Contango, and that, accordingly, any oral information from Mr. Cradock direct with regard to this would not be satisfactory. However, Mr. Cradock would naturally, as District's customer—who introduced the plaintiff company to District—be the person to whom District would turn when information was not forthcoming in the first place from National. Thus these letters throw no light one way or the other on Mr. McMinn's state of knowledge, on the 25th, of the beneficial ownership of the stock.

The other of these documents to which I will refer is Mr. McMinn's report of May 25 to his head office. Mr. McMinn said, with regard to the undertaking,

"I had no knowledge that this was part of the day's transactions. Mr. Cradock had made no reference to a transfer of stock and I decided to await developments so far as this was concerned."

- C As I have already said, however, he agreed in cross-examination that he knew, when he saw the undertaking on the 25th, that it must have something to do with the events of that day's meeting. He explained that the report meant that "it was not part of the day's transactions that Mr. Cradock had told me previously". So this document likewise does not establish that he did not have the knowledge after the meeting upon seeing the undertaking.

- D I pass now from the documents, on which I said District relied, to a most important document, which is an extract from a minute of Mr. McMinn's dated Apr. 25, though, in view of the contents of the minute, it was clearly composed not earlier than Apr. 28 and not later than May 3. For the plaintiff company the date most favourable to District is accepted, namely May 3. The document is headed "Extract from Manager's minute book at 413, Oxford Street, London, W.1" and then underneath "Selangor United Rubber Estates, Ltd." and the date is Apr. 25, 1958. Then the body of the minute commences:

- "Our customer, Mr. Francis R. Cradock, has been negotiating the purchase of this public company for some time, and completion took place today. The account has been transferred to us from the National Bank, Whitehall. Form No. 36 has been completed; any two directors may sign on the account. After the resignation of the old board, Mr. Francis Arthur Jacob and Mr. Francis Evelyn Barlow-Lawson were appointed directors. Mr. Jacob is known to us as Mr. Cradock's estate manager, and he has a private account at this office. The company's account was opened with two drafts for a total of £232,764 which, we assume, represented the balance transferred from the National Bank. A cheque for £232,500 was immediately drawn on the account in favour of Woodstock Trust, Ltd., and this cheque was endorsed in favour of Mr. Cradock, who paid it to his credit. There was a contra entry in his account of £195,322, a draft drawn in favour of Contango Banking and Trading Co., Ltd., which was delivered to the National Bank at the time of the completion. We have since obtained a letter from Woodstock Trust dated Apr. 25, confirming that it was in order for the cheque, which they had received from the Selangor United Estates, Ltd., in the sum of £232,500, to be endorsed by the company in favour of Mr. F. R. Cradock. The letter explained that the item represented a loan to him of the same amount, bearing interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum."

Form No. 36 was a form of mandate to the Bank.

- I Mr. McMinn could not recollect nor make any reasonably acceptable suggestion for any source of information in that minute except (i) his telephone conversation with Mr. Cradock on Apr. 23, (ii) Mr. Reynolds' report on the meeting of Apr. 25, together with the documents which he brought from the meeting, (iii) a conversation with Mr. Sarsfield on the afternoon of the 25th, followed by a letter signed by Mr. Sarsfield of the same date, purporting to confirm for the Woodstock board that the Woodstock cheque endorsement was in order, and (iv) a certified copy of the minute of the meeting of Apr. 25 received by Mr. McMinn with a letter dated May 2.

Mr. McMinn's reference in the words "competition took place today" is clearly to the completion of the purchase of the plaintiff company, which he had just mentioned earlier in the same sentence. He agreed in cross-examination that such completion involves payment for shares in the company and the handing over of some document of title and possibly a change in the directors of the plaintiff company. In the next sentence of the minute he refers to the transfer of the account to District, and I find it irresistible in the context that Mr. McMinn realised when he wrote the minute that the transfer by Mr. Cradock's "influence" was as the result of the completion of the purchase. He then almost immediately refers to the resignation of the old board and afterwards to the appointment of Mr. Jacob and Mr. Barlow-Lawson as directors, though Mr. Barlow-Lawson had already been appointed and, as appeared from the minutes which Mr. McMinn received on May 3, Mr. Barlow-Lawson was not appointed after the resignation of the old board at all, he was a member of the old board. So Mr. McMinn did not see the substitution of a new for an old board mentioned in the minutes, but could only have inferred it from concluding that on completion there was a change in control of the plaintiff company. As he agreed when cross-examined on the minute,

"I had had time to think of what had happened on Apr. 25 and obviously the control of the company had changed hands, which would imply that the majority shareholding had changed hands" and "that the purchase had been completed" or, perhaps more accurately, the implication was the other way round.

Mr. Reynolds said that on the buying of control of a company and its completion he would expect payment of the purchase price, transfer of the shares and the appointment of the purchaser's nominees as directors. Mr. McMinn says that he assumed that the advance from National "represented the balance (that is, of the plaintiff company's account in National) transferred from the National Bank". He then says that the Woodstock cheque was "immediately" drawn on the plaintiff company's new District account and endorsed to Mr. Cradock and paid to the credit of his District account, where there was, he says, a contra entry of the £195,322 draft drawn in favour of Contango "delivered to the National Bank at the time of completion". So he connected the Contango draft with the completion. He did not mention the undertaking in the minute, though, as I have said, he agreed that he connected it with the events of the meeting of Apr. 25. Reference to the undertaking may well have been omitted, because he was awaiting events about it, as he said, or perhaps because it was directed to the transfer rather than to the purely banking aspect of the operation.

Mr. McMinn said that the opening words, referring to Mr. Cradock "negotiating the purchase" rather than "purchasing" indicated that Mr. Cradock was purchasing for another. The letter of Apr. 24, which I mentioned, he signed as "governing director", which might indicate that he was concerned in the first transaction for his group of companies; but it seems to me immaterial whether he was acting for himself or another. If his actions were for another, then indications that the plaintiff company's money was being used to purchase the plaintiff company's shares by Mr. Cradock would mean purchase by Mr. Cradock for another, which, as we know, was in fact himself. Mr. McMinn's explanation that "negotiating the purchase" indicated that Mr. Cradock was purchasing for another was based on Mr. McMinn's construction of his own language, influenced, I think, by his defensive approach. I do not accept that Mr. McMinn, when he wrote the minute, looked beyond Mr. Cradock or considered that Mr. Cradock was acting as an agent.

The payment of the £232,500 into Mr. Cradock's account was clearly to the benefit of District. When it was paid out of the plaintiff company's account, Mr. McMinn realised this perfectly well, as appears from his evidence. In his memorandum of May 20 to his head office he said "I took the view that as we had

A released our draft we were committed at this stage", which he explained as meaning that, on Apr. 25, after releasing the District draft for £195,000 to Contanglo, District would either have to rely on getting the £195,000 from Mr. Cradock or pay the Woodstock cheque into his account. He could have relied on the shares mentioned in the undertaking as security for payment by Mr. Cradock, but that did not occur to him and, indeed, could not have occurred to him if, as he said, he did not realise that the shares mentioned in the undertaking had been purchased by Mr. Cradock. It is clear that, at the time that the Woodstock cheque was honoured by Mr. McMinn, he was fully aware that it was designed to make good Mr. Cradock's debt for the Contanglo draft, and in that sense its payment was a benefit designed for the bank. Its relevance for present purposes is insofar as it bears on the knowledge which the plaintiff alleges. This relevance is, to my mind, as evidence of District's and of Mr. McMinn's personal and official interest in the honouring of the cheque, and thus on the course which they took and the evidence which they give. It is not relied on as an independent ground for establishing liability, apart from the alleged knowledge.

So it was, as District well knew, on the change of control of the plaintiff company with a differently constituted board, by completion of the purchase of its majority shareholding, involving payments of its price and handing over of documents of title, that the following events occurred immediately and virtually simultaneously, to District's knowledge: the plaintiff company's account was transferred from National to District by banker's drafts; the documents for drawing on the new District account were signed; the new account was drawn on by cheque for an amount not far short of its total credit, which cheque, by endorsement, transferred the plaintiff company's moneys to Mr. Cradock. Moreover Mr. Cradock, as District knew, was the person whose "influence" had secured the transfer of the plaintiff company's account to District and who had "been negotiating the purchase", and who had obtained the banker's draft for £195,000, already delivered by District to Contanglo and debited to Mr. Cradock's account, on promise of cover which the Woodstock cheque drawn on the plaintiff company's account would alone now provide.

These facts appear clearly to convey that the plaintiff company's money was being used to finance the purchase of shares in the plaintiff company by Mr. Cradock. Mr. McMinn agreed that he may have drawn the conclusion in May that the plaintiff company's money was being used to finance the purchase of the shares. He also agreed that he had all the material to draw that conclusion on Apr. 25. Mr. Reynolds agreed that the most likely explanation of the material was that the shares were being purchased by Mr. Cradock out of District's moneys replaced by the plaintiff company's moneys. Having regard to the evidence, in particular of Mr. Coombes and Mr. Scott, on the indications of the use of a company's money to buy its shares, then it seems to me a fortiori that a reasonable banker would have no hesitation, on the facts available to District and Mr. McMinn in particular on Apr. 25, in concluding, before debiting the plaintiff company's account with the Woodstock cheque payment, that the plaintiff company's moneys were being used for the purchase of the stock in the plaintiff company by Mr. Cradock. Mr. McMinn and Mr. Reynolds did not do so, because they were completely without any experience in such take-over transactions, because they were not of a calibre to deal with such matters, and, being the kind of persons that they were, they had what Mr. Reynolds not inaptly called a "fixation" about getting the endorsement confirmed.

For reasons already given in considering the law, District, in my view, is liable as claimed in equity because it paid the Woodstock cheque out of the plaintiff company's moneys in circumstances known to District before the payment and in which a reasonable banker would have concluded that the payment was to finance the purchase by Mr. Cradock of the stock in the plaintiff company, even though Mr. McMinn and Mr. Reynolds did not then realise that the payment was being so used. This does not seem to me exacting for a bank, or to require from it any unreasonable standard of care, or cause any substantial inconvenience to the conduct of its affairs, as was suggested—although without substantiation by evidence. The evidence showed that the banks put severe limits, as is common knowledge, on powers of bank managers to grant overdrafts and thus risk the bank's money—limits which bear no comparison at all with the amounts at risk of the plaintiff company on the Woodstock cheque. The evidence also showed that District gave explicit instructions to avoid their being liable for conversion of cheques, when acting as collecting banks. For my part, I can see no substantial difficulty in banks providing against such exceptional transactions, involving substantial amounts, as in this case, being carried through by officials completely inexperienced in such transactions and unqualified to deal with them. If a bank allows such officials to conduct such business it is asking for the kind of trouble which it has got in this case. It does not seem to me hard on a bank to say that it cannot rely on escaping liabilities by entrusting its business to officials completely unqualified to deal with it when if it ensured—as it readily could—that such business would be handled by qualified officials it would, in the event of loss, be liable.

I can deal briefly with the claim in negligence in the performance of the duty which as bankers District owed to the plaintiff company as their customer by honouring the £232,500 cheque drawn on the plaintiff company's account, without any or sufficient enquiry as to the purpose for which it was being applied. It is, of course, common ground that the plaintiff company was District's customer at the relevant time, when the Woodstock cheque was paid, and that District made no enquiry.

All the matters already considered as relevant to the question whether a reasonable banker would have known the purpose for which the £232,500 was to be applied are also relevant (if, as I have concluded (171), there was a duty of care from District to the plaintiff company as its customer) to the question whether the circumstances establish that (in accordance with that duty) District should have enquired as to the purpose for which the money was being applied. If a reasonable banker should have known the purpose as I have concluded, then a fortiori District should, in the performance of its duty of care, have made enquiry. The plaintiff company's directors were obviously persons of whom enquiry should be made.

Mr. McMinn said that if there were a cheque for a large amount, signed by two directors and made payable to one of them, he would, before paying the cheque, enquire of the other of them whether the payment was for a proper consideration. He said he would make the enquiry whether he was paying banker only, or both paying and collecting banker. He agreed also that he knew that Mr. Cradock was in a position to control the share holding or the board and thus influence the transfer of the plaintiff company's account to District. So it was submitted that, even apart from other factors, the transfer of the plaintiff company's account to District by Mr. Cradock's influence, followed immediately by payment by endorsement of a cheque to Mr. Cradock of almost the total amount of over £200,000 paid into the account to meet the £195,000 indebtedness to District for the Contango draft, was such circumstance as to put a reasonable banker on enquiry. I agree. Moreover, when there are added the other matters already considered as relevant to the question whether a reasonable banker would have had knowledge of the purposes for which payment of the plaintiff company's moneys indirectly to Mr. Cradock was made, the establishment of the plaintiff company's case in negligence is correspondingly strengthened. So I conclude that, on negligence too, the plaintiff company's case against District is established.

The claim against Woodstock is that it is liable to account as constructive (171) See p. 1137, letter I, ante, and letter B, above.

A trustee for, and repay with interest, £232,500 of the plaintiff company's moneys, applied to enable Woodstock to lend £232,500 to Mr. Cradock to purchase stock in the plaintiff company in the furtherance of an arrangement made by the defendants to the first transaction claim, including Woodstock (or some of them to which the others were privy), or, alternatively, received of Woodstock knowing that it was or represented money of the plaintiff which had been so misapplied.

It is perfectly clear from Mr. Sarsfield's letter of Apr. 23, 1958, to Mr. Cradock, which I have already quoted fully, that the plaintiff company's £232,500 paid to Woodstock was for the purpose of paying it over to Mr. Cradock to finance the purchase by him of stock in the plaintiff company. That Mr. Sarsfield, a director of Woodstock, by his part in the meeting of Apr. 25, which I have already described, including his endorsement to Mr. Cradock of the £232,500 cheque to Woodstock (later confirmed by the Woodstock board) took part in carrying out the arrangements mentioned in the letter of Apr. 23, 1958, as varied in some immaterial respects over which we need not pause.

For Woodstock it was submitted that there was no reason for supposing that Mr. Sarsfield had any idea on Apr. 25 that Mr. Cradock would not inject assets into the plaintiff company. This is doubtless so if the injection referred to was not injection contemporaneously with or immediately on the purchase of the stock, but at some wholly undetermined time in the nebulous future. There was no reference at all to injection of assets, still less in return for Woodstock's endorsement or payment to Mr. Cradock. The letter makes it clear, in express terms, that the money was to be used for the purchase by Mr. Cradock of the stock in the plaintiff company—not for purchase by the plaintiff company of properties transferred to it from Mr. Cradock or anyone else. So it is clear that Woodstock knowingly participated in applying £232,500 of the plaintiff company's moneys in giving financial assistance for the purchase by Mr. Cradock of stock in the plaintiff company and knowingly received that sum accordingly.

Woodstock is, in my view, liable as constructive trustee as claimed, subject to three questions of law which I shall deal with later, namely, novation, satisfaction and illegality. Indeed, Woodstock did not dispute its liability as constructive trustee as claimed, subject to those three questions of law which in substance constituted its defence.

SECOND TRANSACTION DEFENDANTS

The liability, with which I will now deal, of the second transaction defendants separately is subject to the decisions on the questions of law, which I have indicated will be dealt with after considering the cases against these defendants. In particular, the present consideration of liability is on the footing that Mr. Cradock's payments of £207,500 and £42,000 were payments to the plaintiff company so as to become the plaintiff company's own moneys at the plaintiff company's disposal. How far there were such payments, however, will be considered when I come to deal with them under the heading of "satisfaction".

The first and eighth defendants, Mr. Cradock and Mr. Burden.

The first two defendants with whom I am concerned in the second transaction are Mr. Cradock and Mr. Burden, and it will be convenient to deal with them together.

Of course, the motion for judgment against Mr. Cradock, in default of defence, applies to the claims against him in the second transaction. The claims against Mr. Cradock are based on the allegations that he was a party to an arrangement with Mr. Burden and Mr. Sinclair to misapply the plaintiff company's moneys by the second transaction—in the case of the £207,500 to finance the purchase of the stock in the plaintiff company by Mr. Burden from Mr. Cradock—and that he received the plaintiff company's moneys knowing them to be so misapplied. As in the first transaction, however, Mr. Cradock's part in the second transaction, so far as it bears on the cases with regard to the other defendants, A has to be established positively.

The claims against Mr. Burden are based on the allegations that he misapplied the £207,500 and the £42,000 of the plaintiff company's moneys, in bad faith and in breach of his duty as director and furtherance of an arrangement with Mr. Cradock and Mr. Sinclair to misapply them, in the case of the £207,500 to finance the purchase by him of shares in the plaintiff company from Mr. Cradock, B and that he knowingly received those sums knowing that they had been so misapplied.

The claim against Mr. Cradock and Mr. Burden is in equity to replace those sums with five per cent. interest.

Mr. Burden, whatever his faults, was a likeable person with attractive boyish qualities, though on occasion he gave the impression of ruthlessness. He was an accountant, knowledgeable about companies and business. He was quick and had very considerably ability. In general he appreciated the significance of the questions put to him. He was insistent throughout on declining to say in evidence anything which he said was not within his direct personal knowledge; but I was left with the firm impression that such professed ignorance was on occasion a relief to him. His evidence has to be approached with considerable C caution; but, subject to these reservations, particularly with regard to evidence that directly affected himself, he was generally helpful and co-operative. D

Mr. Burden's evidence was that Mr. Stekel and Mr. Kraft introduced the acquisition of the plaintiff company to Mr. Burden, that Mr. Stekel and Mr. Kraft acted for Mr. Cradock, that they told Mr. Burden that they would organise the transaction in such a way as to use the plaintiff company's liquid resources E to buy the controlling block of shares in the plaintiff company without infringing s. 54 of the Companies Act, 1948, and without Mr. Burden having to find cash of his own for the purpose. Mr. Burden did not find any cash and made no application to any bank to finance the purchase. He said that he left it to Mr. Stekel and Mr. Kraft to organise the transaction. Mr. Stekel and Mr. Kraft acted as agents for both Mr. Cradock and Mr. Burden in agreeing and carrying F through the transaction. I accept this evidence of Mr. Burden.

Mr. Burden did not in any material respect dispute the facts as prima facie established by the documents and already stated by me. He agreed that none of the circle of three cheques for £207,500 each could have been met apart from the others in the circle; and he agreed that he obtained the stock. So that, if the Cradock £207,500 payment to the plaintiff company was a real payment of G that sum for the plaintiff company's own purposes, then the payment to Mr. Burden for payment to Mr. Cradock for the shares which Mr. Cradock sold to Mr. Burden was a misapplication of the plaintiff company's funds to finance the purchase by Mr. Burden from Mr. Cradock of the stock in the plaintiff company which Mr. Burden obtained. Mr. Burden also agreed that, assuming Mr. Cradock's £42,000 cheque to the plaintiff company was a real payment of that sum to the plaintiff company for the plaintiff company's purposes in return for the H
Mr. Briggs bills, then the payment by the plaintiff company to Mr. Burden of £42,000 was a payment for which the plaintiff company got nothing. The facts with regard to the Hopper agreement I have already sufficiently stated; and there is no evidence that comes anywhere near establishing that the plaintiff company had any interest in the Hopper agreement. Nor is there any reasonable I foundation for concluding that Hopper's assets or any other assets were to be injected into the plaintiff company as part of the completion of the purchase of the shares in the plaintiff company by Mr. Burden, or in return for the £42,000 payment to Mr. Burden.

So, in accordance with my conclusions already stated on the relevant law, but subject to the questions of law that I shall deal with later, I conclude that Mr. Burden is liable to replace the £207,500 and the £42,000 with interest as claimed.

A The ninth defendant, Mr. Sinclair.

The claim against Mr. Sinclair is in equity to replace with five per cent. interest the sums of £207,500 and £42,000 of the plaintiff company's moneys, misapplied in bad faith and in breach of duty as director of the plaintiff company and pursuant to an arrangement between Mr. Cradock, Mr. Burden and himself, as to the £207,500 to finance the purchase by Mr. Burden from Mr. Cradock of stock in the plaintiff company, and as to the £42,000 otherwise than for the purposes of the plaintiff company. Mr. Sinclair's case, as presented in his final speech, was principally that he was party to the payments because he was led to assume that they were for the injection of assets into the plaintiff company.

[HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and the relevant facts and circumstances concerning the claim against Mr. Sinclair in regard to the £207,500 cheque and concluded:] I am satisfied that Mr. Sinclair knew perfectly well that the £207,500 cheque drawn on the plaintiff company had been paid as the plaintiff company's bank account showed, and that it had been paid without any injection of assets; and in the repetitions over the same ground in his evidence he only once suggested the possibility that Mr. Burden might be raising funds from a bank to finance the purchase of the shares. It is clear that Mr. Sinclair handed over the plaintiff company's cheque, without security, into the control of Mr. Burden, who was buying control of the plaintiff company and, according to Mr. Sinclair's evidence, on an assurance of the injection of assets into the plaintiff company "as a concomitant", but without any security for such injection or any step being taken to identify or value such assets and without being able to give any explanation why the cheque for assets should be so handed over beforehand. This was, at its lowest, a misapplication of the plaintiff company's funds. I am completely satisfied, however, that Mr. Sinclair knew that they were to be used to pay for the purchase by Mr. Burden from Mr. Cradock of the stock in the plaintiff company and that he handed them over for that purpose. Doubtless he hoped and expected that there would be, at some stage, an injection of some assets; but neither his hopes nor his expectations nor the assets materialised, and they do not prevent his being liable with respect to the £207,500 as claimed.

[HIS LORDSHIP then turned to the £42,000 payment from the plaintiff company's funds, briefly referred to the evidence and continued:] Although the evidence lacks the precision that could be wished, I am satisfied that Mr. Sinclair concurred in the payment of the £42,000 to Mr. Burden without consideration for it and without considering whether it was in the plaintiff company's interests to do so. It seems to me that Mr. Sinclair knew what he was doing and what risks he was running and making the plaintiff company run, though doubtless with regard to the £42,000, as with regard to the £207,500, in the hope and expectation that assets would at some future time be injected by Mr. Burden into the plaintiff company. If Mr. Sinclair did not perfectly well know this, then the conclusion seems irresistible that he was just a Mr. Burden man, doing exactly what Mr. Burden told him to do, regardless of his responsibilities, and, for reasons already given in considering the law, that abnegation in favour of Mr. Burden does not, in my view, enable him to escape liability.

So, subject to the outstanding questions of law, I conclude that Mr. Sinclair is liable as claimed with regard to the £42,000 as with regard to the £207,500 paid out of the plaintiff company's funds to Mr. Burden.

The seventh defendant, The Bank of Nova Scotia.

The claim against the Bank of Nova Scotia ("Nova Scotia") can be dealt with comparatively briefly, despite its importance. The relevant law has already been dealt with and after a very thorough and powerful analysis of the case against Nova Scotia by its counsel, counsel for the plaintiff company, at the end of the day, presented his case within a comparatively small ambit and, A and, in my view, very rightly and helpfully so.

The case is against Nova Scotia in equity as constructive trustee to replace the £249,500 with five per cent. interest and for damages for common law negligence in performing the duty owed by it as banker to the plaintiff company as its customer by paying the £249,500 out of the plaintiff company's account. B
The case in equity is based, not on actual knowledge, but on knowledge which it is said Nova Scotia would have had if it had made enquiries which it was under a duty to make. The case in negligence is also based on failure to make enquiry which it ought to have made. In equity, Nova Scotia would be liable to the same extent as it would have been if it had known what it would have known if it had made proper enquiries and assuming that honest answers would have been thus obtained. In negligence, if one's failure of duty to make C enquiries is established, then negligence is established and what follows is damages in the usual way. No distinction has been drawn between facts putting on enquiry under the equitable claim on the one hand, or under the negligence claim on the other hand, and, in my view, for reasons already given in considering the law, the standard in each case is that of a reasonable banker. The first material question in each case is whether the facts would have put a reasonable D banker on enquiry. If so, the question would arise whether it should have made enquiries which it did not make and, in the case of the equitable claim, what answers it would have received to such enquiries.

The plaintiff company alleges that Nova Scotia ought to have had knowledge of the purposes for which the moneys were to be applied from the facts alleged in the statement of claim and through their officials who honoured the cheques. E Further particulars, given in the course of the hearing, consisting of documents were not relied on. There seems to be no advantage in making further reference to particulars, since the matters on which the plaintiff company eventually rested its case were limited to three only, to which I shall soon come.

The only Nova Scotia representative with whom we need to be concerned is Mr. Evans, who was the second ranking official of the Nova Scotia branch F dealing with this matter. Mr. Evans gave evidence and he was rightly accepted for the plaintiff company as a completely honest, reliable and helpful witness.
The mandate for the drawing of cheques on the plaintiff company's account at Nova Scotia, signed by Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Burden, as the plaintiff company's cheques for £207,500 and £42,000 were signed, is accepted by the plaintiff company as being in order. G

I now come to the three matters relied on by the plaintiff company to establish that Nova Scotia is, in accordance with the law which I have already considered, to be treated as having knowledge because it was put on enquiry and indisputably made none.

1. On Feb. 10, almost immediately after the banking resolutions of Jan. 26 and after the mandate was given, the plaintiff company's cheque for £207,500 H was paid out of its account at Nova Scotia. What is relied on is that this payment was, in itself, and in relation to other entries in the plaintiff company's bank account, for a very large sum and that it was paid immediately after the resolutions and mandate. It was suggested that these facts were enough in themselves to put the Nova Scotia bank on enquiry. But this payment of £207,500 was not an isolated payment out of the account, but a payment counter-balanced by a I payment into the account. It was in fact part of the three cheques circular movement, and it was as such that it was presented to and seen by Nova Scotia.
It therefore seems to me unrealistic and unhelpful to consider what the effect of such payment in isolation would have been, had it occurred—which it did not.

2. The payment was to Mr. Burden's account with Nova Scotia and that account was opened with that payment and was closed after three credit items were counter-balanced by corresponding debit items (the credit items being the

- A £207,500 and £42,000 and a sum of £44,600, with which we are not concerned, debited and credited on Apr. 28, 1960). Again the £207,500 was part of the circular cheque operation, as Nova Scotia knew, and it was the first of the items in Mr. Burden's account with Nova Scotia. The account remained open after this. The £42,000 debit and credit was the second item in the account; and the account again remained open and in fact was operated for the third item.
- B Nova Scotia has to be judged in the light of the facts before it when it honoured the cheque, and not in the light of the subsequent events. The £207,500 cheque was paid by Nova Scotia in the light of what was then known to Nova Scotia, and the £42,000 in the light of what was known when that sum was paid, including, doubtless, its knowledge of what had occurred when the £207,500 was paid. Each of these two cheques from the plaintiff company into Mr.
- C Burden's account was part of similar circular movements of cheques between the same parties, and, again, they must be judged, not in isolation, but as part of these circular movements. So the opening and closing of Mr. Burden's account taken in isolation does not appear to me to be realistic or helpful, when it can only be truly assessed as part of the operation of which it formed part.

- D 3. So I come to the third matter relied on by the plaintiff company, which is the nub of the plaintiff company's case against Nova Scotia. It is the circular movement of the £207,500 cheque and the explanation given to Mr. Evans about it. Mr. Evans said that he had no recollection of any event involving the £42,000 cheques. The bank's liability for that later operation seems to me to stand or fall with its liability for the £207,500 cheque operation—nor do I
- E understand that, in this respect, any party has sought to draw any distinction between them.

- On Feb. 10 during the luncheon hour, when the manager and probably a counter official were out, Mr. Evans was in charge and at his desk behind the counter. Mr. Bieber called and Mr. Evans attended to him. He asked for the manager and Mr. Evans took him into the manager's room. Mr. Evans agreed
- F that Mr. Bieber could have asked for the manager because it was a very unusual transaction; and that he gave his explanation as a serious explanation to have some effect on Mr. Evans's mind and, it could be, to set it at rest. Mr. Bieber produced the three cheques which he wanted debited and credited to the accounts of the plaintiff company and Mr. Cradock and an account to be opened for Mr. Burden. He explained, either voluntarily or in answer to Mr. Evans, that they
- G were for "internal accounting reasons" or "internal book-keeping reasons". Mr. Evans filled in three paying-in slips, with copies for the parties, for the payment of the three cheques through their accounts. He had no knowledge of Mr. Burden or Mr. Bieber, but Mr. Bieber had the cheques and Mr. Evans considered the position and accepted what Mr. Bieber said. Was the result of his consideration wrong and ought a reasonable banker to have made enquiry,
- H which Nova Scotia did not make?

- There is no suggestion that Mr. Evans or Nova Scotia was in fact suspicious and Mr. Evans denied that he was suspicious. Mr. Evans knew that Mr. Cradock had had a large holding of stock in the plaintiff company in November, 1958, but he did not know that he had a holding in the plaintiff company in February, 1960. He did not know that Mr. Burden had any intention of purchasing any
- I of those shares or that any deal with regard to the stock in the plaintiff company was being transacted or contemplated. He believed what Mr. Bieber said, and he had no knowledge with regard to Mr. Bieber, Mr. Cradock, Mr. Burden or the plaintiff company that would cause him to doubt Mr. Bieber's explanation. He saw that, at the end of the three cheque operation, the balance in the accounts would be exactly the same as before.

Mr. Evans was cross-examined on Mr. Bieber's explanation—not, however, on "accounting reasons" or "book-keeping reasons", but upon their being "internal". Mr. Evans suggested that, though he agreed that the debiting and crediting of the cheques would be payment, they would also be evidence of payment; and this, of course, was not challenged. The cross-examination then went on the footing that "internal" applied only to internal to the plaintiff company. In this cross-examination Mr. Evans agreed that it was an inappropriate description and, therefore, an unsatisfactory explanation; but Mr. Bieber had not said of "internal" that it was internal to the plaintiff company, and counsel for Nova Scotia rightly observed that it could refer to internal to the parties. Counsel for the plaintiff company himself very fairly suggested in cross-examination that "internal" might well have been used to describe moneys passing between a company and its subsidiaries; and, similarly I should have thought, between a company and some individuals, even though subsidiaries and individuals could be regarded as external to the Company. As my conclusion on the law is that the standard to be applied is the objective standard of a reasonable banker, what I am concerned with is not Mr. Evans' subjective reaction and statement on cross-examination that "internal" made Mr. Bieber's explanation unsatisfactory, but whether it should, in the circumstances at the time, have put a reasonable banker on enquiry.

In my view, it is quite immaterial whether Mr. Bieber's explanation was in answer to an enquiry or not. If it was in answer to an enquiry, which did not put on further enquiry, cadit quaestio; and if it would have been an answer to an enquiry that was not put and did not put on further enquiry, then similarly cadit quaestio. The only purpose of the enquiry is to get an answer, not to perform some ritualistic mumbo-jumbo, and if the purpose of the enquiry is served without the enquiry it is so much better for the saving of words—though not, unfortunately, in this judgment.

The explanation stands subject to the criticisms that were made, and rightly made, of it in cross-examination. It is right that the explanation should be dissected verbally, as it was, so that all the implications are brought out clearly for the assistance of the court. When it comes to judgment, however, I have to regard it, not as technical terms in conveyancing, or words used with precision in some leisurely legal document, but as more rough and ready language used in a business context and to be accepted or rejected or questioned with expedition. In the Penmount Estates case (172) the bank was held not negligent, though, as MACKINNON, L.J. said (173),

"there were a good many questions on which a lawyer who is trained very differently from a bank clerk, would probably have had it in mind to cross-examine".

So regarding the explanation, in the light of all the relevant considerations which I have referred to in considering the law, and of the surrounding circumstances which I have mentioned, it seems to me that the explanation, justifiably assumed to be honest, did not put Nova Scotia on further enquiry. What in the final analysis is said to put a reasonable banker on further enquiry is the one word "internal". Despite it being subject to the criticisms which I have described, that is not to my mind enough.

If, contrary to my view, Nova Scotia were under a duty to make enquiry, then as they did not do so the claim in negligence would succeed. Success in the claim in equity would depend on the answer which Nova Scotia would receive to their enquiries, on the footing that the answers were truthful. The obvious persons of whom enquiry should be made were the plaintiff company's directors, the signatories Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Burden. If Mr. Sinclair had been asked to explain what the payment by the plaintiff company was for, he would have said, in accordance with my finding in considering Mr. Sinclair's liability, that it was for payment by Mr. Burden for Mr. Cradock's stock in the plaintiff company. Alternatively, he would have said, as he maintained in his evidence,

(173) (1945), 173 L.T. at p. 346.

A that the cheque was drawn pending completion of such purchase and, perhaps, "as a concomitant" to injection of assets into the plaintiff company by Mr. Burden; or that he wholly relied on Mr. Burden. Mr. Sinclair said no payment would have taken place if Nova Scotia had enquired of him about the payment. Mr. Burden would have said, if he answered truthfully to the enquiry, that he was using the £207,500 to pay for the purchase of Mr. Cradock's stock in the plaintiff company, and the £42,000 for his own purposes or for purchasing the Hopper Company, with the addition, perhaps, that he had it in mind, though without telling anybody, that he might make it over to the plaintiff company. Payment in the face of any of these answers would, in my view, make Nova Scotia liable in equity as claimed; but, as I have said, no occasion for enquiry, in my view, arose (see p. 1144, letter H, ante) and, therefore, Nova Scotia is not

THE REMAINING QUESTIONS OF LAW (5) TO (9)

Namely, (5) Novation, (6) Satisfaction, (7) Loss from the second transaction, (8) Illegality, (9) Section 448 of the Companies Act, 1948.

D 5. Novation.

I come now to two inter-related but separate defences to liability on the first transaction, first novation and, secondly, satisfaction. With regard to each of these defences it will be convenient to consider law and fact together. Novation is relied on by Woodstock to exonerate it from its alleged liability which is as

E constructive trustee on the first transaction. Satisfaction is relied on to exonerate from liability all those who might be held liable as claimed on the first transaction, whether as trustees, constructive trustees or in negligence. First, then, novation.

It is claimed by Woodstock and not disputed by the plaintiff company that there was a contractual liability, a debt, from Woodstock to the plaintiff company with regard to the £232,500 paid under the plaintiff company's cheque to Woodstock in the first transaction. The plaintiff company, of course, in this action claims not on that debt but against Woodstock (inter alios) as constructive trustee to account for and replace that sum. It is not disputed that there was a novation. The issue is whether it was limited to Woodstock's separate debt to the plaintiff company or extended to the liability alleged in the action against

G Woodstock as constructive trustee, jointly and severally with others. In the course of the argument the question arose whether the second transaction was a sham cloaking what did not appear on its surface. The defendants brought forward convincing considerations to the contrary, and as the plaintiff company was not concerned to press opposition to this, I will not pause over it.

The novation relied on is that which, it is not disputed, occurred by reason of the resolution at the first meeting of the plaintiff company's board on Jan. 26, 1960, and the exchange of cheques between Mr. Cradock and Woodstock, acting on the footing of that resolution, to all of which I have already alluded. The resolution was that "the amount due to the company from Woodstock Trust, Ltd., F.R.C. Properties and General Investment, Ltd., and M.V.R. Motors, Ltd., be taken as to £207,500 . . . by . . . Mr. Cradock . . . and as to £42,000 . . . or such balancing figure as may be due by Henry Briggs Son & Co. (Trust), Ltd."

I

The resolution itself points to a debt and not to a liability in equity. The "amount due" and the "balancing figure" indicates specific liquidated amounts into whose calculation the interest rate (eight per cent on the debt) would enter, and there was no basis for an equitable claim against F.R.C. and M.V.R. which, in the resolution, were bracketed and treated on the same footing as Woodstock. It is clear from Mr. Cradock's letters in evidence, that his mind was directed to the contractual debt; and Mr. Jacobs' evidence was to the effect that no thought was given to the equitable claim. Indeed, the case of the relevant defendants has throughout been that the payment of the £232,500 by the plaintiff company to Woodstock was a loan, and that there was no question of any basis for an equitable claim against Woodstock any more than against M.V.R. and F.R.C. I am satisfied that none of the relevant parties had in mind any other basis of liability of Woodstock to the plaintiff company than in debt with regard to the plaintiff company's loan to Woodstock. In my view, what this novation, on its true construction, was purporting to effect was the substitution of Mr. Cradock and Mr. Briggs in place of Woodstock as debtor with regard to the amount due under the £232,500 loan to Woodstock at eight per cent. interest. Is it, nevertheless, a novation which disposes of Woodstock's liability in equity as constructive trustee?

For Woodstock it was conceded that it was precluded before me, by the ratio decidendi in Quistclose Investments, Ltd. v. Rolls Razor, Ltd. (in voluntary liquidation) (174) from succeeding in the submission that the relationship of debtor and creditor for money lent ipso facto excludes any conception of constructive or other trust arising out of what establishes the relationship of debtor and creditor; but the submission was kept open for a higher court.

It seems to me at least questionable whether novation, as contrasted with release, is applicable to wrongdoing at all as contrasted with contract; but I will not pursue this, as it was not canvassed before me and it does not affect my conclusion. It is sufficient that it was not suggested, nor in my view could it reasonably be suggested, the Mr. Cradock and Mr. Briggs by novation took over the liability of Woodstock in equity as constructive trustees. So what the submission for Woodstock comes to is that, though it was novation, it was novation with regard to debt only. It could only be elimination with regard to the separate claim in equity. There was no conscious act of such elimination, for example by express release or agreement. Nor, in my view, is it necessarily implied in the novation.

It is said, however, that, so far as the same facts establish rights and remedies at common law and equity, then an agreement, where appropriate by release assignment or novation, affecting the rights and remedies at common law would equally affect those in equity. It is not disputed that this may occur where liabilities and remedies are provided in common law and equity to secure payment of the same sum for the same reason on the same facts, for example for a principal to recover an agent's secret profit; where the common law implies a contract for payment of the money as money had and received to the principal's use, and equity imposes a constructive trusteeship of the money for the principal; the common law use and the equity trusteeship being applied because in the eyes of common law and equity alike it is inequitable for the agent to retain the money. In our case, however, the basis of the claim which is made in equity against Woodstock as constructive trustee is separate from any claim which might have been made against it as debtor but which, in fact, has not been made. The claim in equity is based on the application of the money by the plaintiff company's directors with the participation of Woodstock, through the loan, to the purchase of the plaintiff company's stock. The claim in debt is made on the loan, the claim in equity on surrounding circumstances that make the loan an instrument of misapplication of the plaintiff company's funds by the directors, with the participation of Woodstock. The claim in debt existed without relying on the facts establishing the constructive trusteeship; and the claim with regard to the constructive trusteeship would exist even though the money paid by the plaintiff company to Woodstock did not constitute a loan. The claim in debt arises ex contractu, and in equity from wrongdoing, in debt for the amount lent plus eight per cent. interest, and in equity to replace the amount misapplied at an equitable rate of interest. The claim at common

A law is against Woodstock only, the claim in equity is against Woodstock jointly and severally with others.

In my view, the novation which occurred, neither in intention, nor on construction of the contract which constituted novation, nor in its effect, comprised any obligations as constructive trustee upon which the plaintiff company's claim is founded in these proceedings. What it did was to place Mr. Cradock and Mr. Briggs in the place of Woodstock with regard to Woodstock's outstanding debt to the plaintiff company.

6. Satisfaction.

So I pass to the defence of satisfaction, which, as I have said, is relied on against all claims based on the first transaction. The plaintiff company and those who are defendants with regard to the second transaction contest this defence of the defendants to the first transaction. The satisfaction relied on is satisfaction of Woodstock's debt to the plaintiff company for £232,500 plus outstanding interest at eight per cent. taken over as to £207,500 by Mr. Cradock and as to £42,000 (or the balance of the debt) by Briggs.

Any such satisfaction was of the whole of the Woodstock debt, and as that debt was in respect of £232,500 plus interest at eight per cent. in exceeded the principal amount of £232,500 claimed by the plaintiff company and any conceivable rate of interest which the court might allow on it up to the date of such satisfaction. Consequently, if there were satisfaction, as the defendants submit, the plaintiff company's loss on the first transaction in respect of which it now claims would have been made good, and there would have been no loss in respect of which the defendants could be held liable on the first transaction.

The satisfaction of Woodstock's debt is said to be effected in accordance with the plaintiff company's resolution of Jan. 26, which I have mentioned, by a cheque for £207,500 in settlement of Mr. Cradock's liability and bills payable on future specified dates for a total of £42,000 in settlement of Mr. Briggs' liability; such cheque for £207,500 being delivered on Jan. 26, 1960, and paid on Feb. 10, 1960, as part of the circular movement of three cheques for the same amount which I have described; and such bills being later handed to Mr. Cradock for a cheque dated Feb. 19, 1960, for £42,000 from Mr. Cradock to the plaintiff company and paid on Feb. 25, 1960, as part of another circular movement of three cheques for the same amount, which I have also described. The giving of a cheque with regard to a pre-existing debt is a conditional payment, whose condition is satisfied on the cheque being honoured, whereupon it becomes actual payment as from the giving of the cheque (Marreco v. Richardson, (175)). Both the Mr. Cradock's cheques were honoured in this case, in the context of the three cheque circular movement. The question is whether, having regard to what is involved in this movement as part of the second transaction, there was satisfaction?

As I have indicated, the second transaction with its circular movement of cheques was not a sham. In particular, the plaintiff company and Nova Scotia expressly accepted, with regard to the £207,500 cheques, that Mr. Cradock intended to pay off his debt to the plaintiff company by his cheque; that Mr. Burden intended to pay for the stock by his cheque; that Mr. Cradock intended to transfer the stock to Mr. Burden; that Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Burden intended to pay £207,500 of the plaintiff company's moneys to Mr. Burden; and, with regard to the £42,000 cheque, that Mr. Cradock intended by his cheque to redeem the Mr. Briggs' bills and to satisfy Mr. Briggs' indebtedness to the plaintiff company; that Mr. Burden intended to pay £42,000 to Mr. Cradock with regard to Hopper; and that Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Burden intended £42,000 of the plaintiff company's money to be paid to Mr. Burden.

As the second transaction was not a sham, there was payment to the plaintiff company of £207,500 plus £42,000; but was the payment satisfaction?

It was submitted that if the payment by the plaintiff company for £232,500 in the first transaction (and likewise of £207,500 in the second transaction) was to give assistance as alleged by the plaintiff company for the purchase of stock in the plaintiff company, then it was for a purpose made illegal under s. 54 of the Companies Act, 1948, and the payments were unlawful and the plaintiff company's claim therefore fails; or, alternatively, that the payment was valid, in which case the payment of £207,500—it was not only admitted but was submitted—was likewise valid and the payment of the £207,500, together with a payment of £42,000, was in satisfaction of the debt with regard to the £232,500 and interest. It is immaterial whether the validity of such payments arose because s. 54 did not apply at all or because it did not operate, on its wording, to invalidate the payments in accordance with the first ground of decision in Victor Battery Co. Ltd. v. Curry's Ltd. (176), which I will consider later when dealing with illegality under s. 54.

Insofar as the plaintiff company's claim fails, on the ground of illegality, then there is no need to rely on satisfaction. The defence of satisfaction only becomes material on the footing that illegality does not make the debt to the plaintiff company irrecoverable. And it seems to me that, as the payments of £207,500 and £42,000 were in fact made, it is immaterial to the defence of satisfaction whether they were tainted with illegality or not. If not, they would stand, and, if tainted, the court would lend no assistance with regard to them and they would likewise stand. It does not follow, however, that because the payments are effective as payments, therefore they operate in satisfaction of the debt. So I return the question asked earlier: were these payments of £207,500 and £42,000 satisfaction?

Such payments, if treated in isolation, would constitute satisfaction. But do they constitute satisfaction in the circumstances in which they were made? If these payments, amounting to £249,500, were only made as part of the three cheque circular movements, by which the payments to the plaintiff company were dependent upon corresponding payments out by the plaintiff company's directors from the plaintiff company's account to the payer, by a scheme in which the payer participates and without advantage to the plaintiff company, then the payer is giving with one hand what he at the same time takes away with the other. The plaintiff company has the satisfaction of a conduit pipe. Even if one whistles half time when the money is in the plaintiff company's hands, yet it must be the final result that matters in this as in other little games, the more so if the game is fraudulent and dishonest and fixed from the start. Satisfaction must be true and real satisfaction and not part of what makes satisfaction a mockery. I do not find it surprising that there is no authority for such a conclusion: and it is my conclusion.

7. Loss from the second transaction.

Did the plaintiff company suffer any loss by reason of the second transaction?

I have concluded that no satisfaction was established by the second transaction, because the payment to the plaintiff company under its three-cheque-circular movement was not, in reality, a payment for the plaintiff company to have at all. As the payment to the plaintiff company did not, however, provide any money for the plaintiff company, the plaintiff company received no money under the second transaction capable of being misapplied; and as the three cheque operation thus, so far as it affected the plaintiff company, merely substituted Mr. Burden's liability to the plaintiff company in place of Mr. Cradock's liability to the plaintiff company, and the plaintiff company conceded that neither was good for the money, there was no damage within the claim for negligence. These considerations are fatal to the plaintiff company's claims based on the second transaction. In the case of Nova Scotia they are additional to the reasons which have already been given for the failure of the claims against it. In the cases of Mr. Burden and Mr. Sinclair the absence of receipt by the

A plaintiff company of money capable of being misapplied reverses the decision against them which, as I have indicated, I would otherwise have made.

If, however, there was satisfaction, so that the plaintiff company obtained the £249,500 for itself and its own purposes, the question then arises whether there was misapplication of those moneys under the second transaction, and who was liable for such misapplication, and whether there was negligence on the part of Nova Scotia with regard to those moneys?

With regard to the claim in negligence, it was submitted for Nova Scotia that any damage thereby suffered was too remote to be recoverable. Overseas Tankship (U.K.), Ltd. v. Morts Dock & Engineering Co. Ltd., The Wagon Mound (177) laid down that in tort "the essential factor in determining liability is whether the damage is of such a kind as the reasonable man should have foreseen" and whether the defendant "foresaw or could reasonably foresee the intervening events which led to its [i.e. the damage] being done". It was submitted for District that in a claim based on negligence of an agent under contract (as distinct from direct breach of contract), such as the claims in negligence against the banks in this case, the first passage quoted provided the test. This was not disputed and the case proceeded on that footing.

D It seems to me that, if a bank pays a cheque out of its customer's account as Nova Scotia did, and does so negligently, then the loss to the customer is that loss which a reasonable man should have foreseen and is, in the absence of special circumstances, the amount paid on the cheque. It was suggested, however, that there was a special circumstance, namely that when Mr. Cradock was the debtor of the plaintiff company he was not good for the amount of the cheque, as the plaintiff company conceded, and, therefore, so the argument went, the substitution of Mr. Burden as debtor in place of Mr. Cradock resulted in no loss. This submission, however, which we are considering only becomes material if there has been, by the Cradock cheque, a real genuine payment to the plaintiff company for itself constituting satisfaction; and if Mr. Cradock was not good for the amount there was no satisfaction. The special circumstance that Mr. Cradock was not good for the money, i.e. was unable to meet the cheque to the plaintiff company, seems to me contrary to the very hypothesis on which the submission is made, namely that the money was the plaintiff company's own real money as the result of the payment of the cheque by Mr. Cradock. This seems to me the answer to Nova Scotia's submission that there was no damage because Mr. Cradock was not good for the amount of his cheque.

G To pursue the submission on the footing that Mr. Cradock effectively paid to the plaintiff company for itself the amount of the cheque, which he was unable to pay, seems to me to lead to mental contortions that appear, happily, to be unnecessary.

8. Illegality.

H It was submitted that, insofar as the plaintiff company's claim was founded on payment of its moneys as means of giving financial assistance for the purchase of stock in the plaintiff company, the payment was unlawful and the plaintiff company's claim fails. This submission does not affect the plaintiff company's claim with regard to the £42,000 but it does affect claims made by the plaintiff company with regard to the £232,500 (including the £195,000 claimed against Contango) and the £207,500, insofar as these claims are based on breach of trust and on constructive trusteeship.

I Of course, if the plaintiff company does not establish the breach of trust or requisite constructive trusteeship, there is no need to rely on the defence of illegality against a claim founded on them. So this defence goes on the assumption that, in the case of the directors, breach of trust or fiduciary duty and, in the case of the other defendants, constructive trusteeship is established.

Section 54 of the Companies Act, 1948, provides that "it shall not be lawful for a company to give . . . any financial assistance for the purpose of . . . a purchase . . . made or to be made by any person of or for any shares in the company . . .".

It is not disputed by the plaintiff company that if a contract or "consensual arrangement" is illegal ex facie, or made for an illegal purpose, then the court will not assist in enforcing the contract or "consensual arrangement" (whether e.g. by specific performance, money judgment, or damages) or to recover property (including money) passed in pursuance of it. The plaintiff company contends, however, that such refusal of the court to assist is limited to cases of contract or "consensual arrangement" and does not extend in particular to claims based on breach of trust.

The ambit, within which such consequences of the illegality operate, has by no means been clearly defined. This amply appeared from the arguments before me. The usual field of its operation is certainly contract; but then contract is the field which gives most scope for its operation.

The principle governing such consequences of illegality is not, however, just a twig of any particular branch of the law, but is rooted deeply in public policy—that the courts are not to be instruments for aiding illegality. The policy is not that the courts are not to be instruments for aiding illegality in contract, but may be instruments for aiding illegality in other branches of the law. It is in accordance with this substantial public policy nature of the courts' refusal of aid to illegality that such illegality is not treated as a matter of pleading, or a matter merely as between the parties, but as a matter of which the court will, of its own initiative, take cognisance irrespective of pleadings or wishes of the parties. The objection to aiding illegality is thus not limited in its origin in public policy to any particular form of action.

The principle has, of course, been stated in various terms in the authorities. It has been stated in terms, primarily at any rate, directed to contract, in particular in an accumulation of passages in Taylor v. Chester (178) upon which the plaintiff company heavily relied. That, however, was the case of a claim based on contract, namely a contract of bailment. (The relevant illegality was the illegal purpose of that contract. There was a second count in court, namely detinue, but it was irrelevant to consider the illegal purpose with regard to tort, since the claim in detinue was defeated by proof of the contract of bailment.)

The principle has also been stated in general terms: "... we will not assist an illegal transaction in any respect" (per LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J. in Edgar v. Fowler, (179) "No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action on an immoral or an illegal act" (per LORD MANSFIELD, C.J. in Holman v. Johnson (180); "The act itself being forbidden, I do not think it can be a source of civil rights in the courts of this country" (per LORD RADCLIFFE in Boissevain v. Weil, (181)). The first two of these cases were contract cases; and it has been rightly urged for the plaintiff company that the words used should be understood in the contractual context in which they occurred. This would still leave open the question whether the words should be confined to contract by the contractual context, or whether they should be read as words of more general significance, of which contract was a particular application.

In Boissevain v. Weil (182) the claim was founded primarily in debt for repayment of the sum borrowed in foreign currency, contrary to war-time Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939; but there was an alternative claim for money had and received, on the principle of unjust enrichment. Moreover, the view was expressed, without decision in view of the relevant pleading being inadequate, that whether such a claim for money had and received was based on an imputed promise to pay or upon the principle of unjust

A enrichment, the court would not assist (see in particular LORD RADCLIFFE (183) and LORD SIMONDS (184), expressing his concurrence with the Court of Appeal which had so decided). The relevance of this reference is that it goes to show that a claim, though it be not based on promise or contract, but on the equitable principle of unjust enrichment, yet is affected, like contract, by illegality. It also sustains the view that LORD RADCLIFFE, in stating that he
 B did not consider than an illegal act " can be a source of civil rights in the courts of this country ", deliberately intended the wide meaning which his words prima facie bear.

The plaintiff company contended that this case did not establish more than that the law will not impose an obligation to do that which, if it had been agreed between the parties to it, would have been illegal. The imposing of an
 C obligation by law is, however, the counterpart of a recognition of a right by law; and all the rights, and the only rights, in which we are concerned in this court are rights recognised by law. So the contention may be amended to read that the case does not establish more than that the law will not assist (or thus recognise) a right to do an illegal act which if it had been agreed between the parties to that act would have been illegal. This goes well beyond saying that
 D the consequences of illegality which have been mentioned are limited to contract or to " consensual arrangements ". Moreover having got so far, there seems no justification for importing any limitation that the illegal act must be such that was capable of being agreed between parties to it.

It seems to me, with the greatest respect to the able argument advanced for the plaintiff company, that the statement quoted from LORD RADCLIFFE (183), E understood in its ordinary prima facie meaning, is to be preferred to confining this principle of illegality to contract and " consensual arrangements ". Does the principle, however, prevent an action succeeding for breach of trust in doing what is illegal?

In Steen v. Law (185) directors of a company, incorporated in New South Wales, lent the company's funds which the directors had to give financial F assistance to purchase the company's shares. The liquidator of the company claimed that there had thus been a breach of a New South Wales section, which, so far as material, was in the terms of s. 54; and that the directors had thereby committed a breach of their fiduciary duty to the company and should reimburse the company the sums so illegally applied. It was not contended that the directors were absolved from accounting by reason of the illegality of
 G the loan by the company. Such illegality was clearly before the Privy Council and, if available against such a claim, provided a complete answer to it. Yet the point was neither taken by the defendants nor by the Privy Council; and it seems to me for the very good reason that the company was not relying for its claim on the unlawful loan and the relationship of creditor and debtor thereby created, but upon the misapplication by the directors of the company's moneys
 H by way of the unlawful loan. That is the position with regard to the plaintiff company's claim in our case. It was founding its claim, as in our case, not on a wrong done by it as a party to the unlawful loan, but as a wrong done to it by parties owing a fiduciary duty to it. The courts were being invited, as in our case, not to aid illegality but to condemn it. If this were not so, the courts would give redress to companies against directors for misapplication and breach
 I of fiduciary duty which did not involve the company in illegality, but no redress if they were so serious as to involve the company in illegality.

I appreciate that, in the ordinary case of a claim by a beneficiary against a trustee for an illegal breach of trust, the beneficiary is not a party to the illegality; but that, when directors act for a company in an illegal transaction with a stranger, the company is itself a party to that transaction and therefore to the illegality. The company, therefore, could not rely on that transaction as "the source of civil rights" and, therefore, for example, it could not successfully sue the stranger with regard to rights which it was claimed that the transaction conferred. If, however, property had passed under the illegal transaction, it is common ground that the right which the holding of that property conferred would be good against all the world, since the court would not assist the only party which had a better title, namely the party from whom it passed under the illegal transaction, to recover it. The right of the holder would be assisted by the courts, because it would be a right established by the holding, without having to rely on any right claimed to be conferred by the illegal transaction - and nonetheless because it was in pursuance of the illegal transaction to which the holder was a party, that the holding in fact arose (see particularly Sajan Singh v. Sarlara Ali, (186) and Chettiar v. Chettiar, (187). In a claim based on an illegal breach of trust the claimant does not rely on a right conferred or created by that breach. On the contrary, he relies on a right breached by the breach, as the very words "breach of trust" indicate. It is only on the footing that there is a breach of trust that the defence of illegality becomes relevant. So it is assumed, for present purposes, that there is a breach of trust against the plaintiff company by those who are directors and by those who are claimed to be constructive trustees. The constructive trustees are, it is true, parties with the plaintiff company itself to the transaction which is illegal. The plaintiff company's claim, however, for breach of trust is not made by it as a party to that transaction, or in reliance on any right which that transaction is alleged to confer, but against the directors and constructive trustees for perpetrating that transaction and making the plaintiff company party to it in breach of trust owing to the plaintiff company. The breach of trust includes the making of the plaintiff company a party to the illegal transaction. So it seems to me clear on analysis that the plaintiff company is not precluded from relying on breach of trust by a party to an illegal transaction, to which the plaintiff company itself is a party, when the breach includes the making of the plaintiff company a party to that very transaction. Those who proved to be constructive trustees, sharing the responsibility with the directors for the breach of trust, share the liability too.

The result is that the plaintiff company in this case would not, by reason of illegality, be prevented from being reimbursed money paid by it unlawfully under a transaction to which it is a party. This, however, does not mean that this would nullify the ordinary operation of illegality with regard to companies and parties outside the company, and not being or treated as being a trustee to it. But it would prevent such operation shielding those whose position or conduct makes them responsible as owing a fiduciary duty or as constructive trustee.

In the course of the argument Victor Battery Co., Ltd. v. Curry's, Ltd. (188) was considered at length, with its implications for this case. It does not seem to me, on the views which I have taken on the different questions of law which have arisen, that the Victor Battery case (188) affects my conclusions. As, however, that case has been relied on in various ways in the course of the hearing, and as it may conceivably be material to matters which will have to be considered at the close of this judgment, it may assist the parties, as well as showing a proper and grateful appreciation of the very able argument addressed to me, if I deal with it.

In that case the plaintiff company issued a debenture to secure a loan by another company to another person for the purchase of shares in the plaintiff company. The plaintiff company asked for a declaration that the debenture was invalid. It was decided: (i) that where a company gave by means of a security, which was a debenture, financial assistance for or in connection with

- A the purchase of shares in the company, the debenture was a valid debenture, and (ii) that even assuming that the debenture was an illegal contract, the plaintiff company was not a person for whose protection the illegality had been created, so that it was not relieved from the operation of the rule that a party to a transaction void for illegality cannot recover property transferred under it, which is in accordance with the maxim in pari delicto potior est conditio
- B defendantis.

The Court of Appeal in the unreported case of Essex Aero Ltd. v. Cross (189) has since confirmed that a company within s. 54 is not a person for whose protection the illegality has been created. As a debenture creates a floating security, which confers a property interest in the property for the time being subject to the security, then it would be in accordance with well established

- C law already referred to that the property interest should remain in the debenture-holder despite the illegality. I am not concerned in this case with any question of the second ground of decision; but considerable criticism has been made of the first ground of decision (see Dressy Frocks Pty., Ltd. v. Bock, (190); E. H. Dey Pty., Ltd. (in liquidation) v. Dey, (191) and see PALMER ON COMPANY LAW (20th Edn.) p. 443). It is with this first ground of decision that I am
- D concerned.

What was suggested in argument was that if the debenture in the Victor Battery case (192), being "security" within s. 54, was valid, then the loans to Woodstock and to Mr. Burden were valid, since "loan" and "security" are treated together on the same footing in s. 54, i.e. in the provision that it shall not be lawful for a company to give "whether by means of a loan, guarantee, or the provision of security or otherwise, any financial assistance . . .". ROXBURGH, J., said (193):

- "The section provides, not that it shall not be lawful for a company to provide a security in order to give financial assistance, but that it shall not be lawful for a company by means of the provision of security to give any financial assistance. In my judgment, 'security' prima facie means 'valid security', although I do not say that it must mean that. Moreover, the words of the section are not 'purport to give financial assistance' but 'give financial assistance' and I cannot see how an invalid debenture could give any financial assistance".
- F

Thus it was insisted that the security must itself be the means of giving financial assistance and that an invalid security could not give financial assistance because, as I understand it, of its invalidity. It has been doubted (for example in the Australian cases) whether an invalid security cannot give financial assistance. In a narrow strict sense, the security itself gives no financial assistance, in the narrow sense of payment, at all, but is security for the repayment of the financial assistance or payment that is given; but that is so however valid the security. The financial assistance for which the security is given is, therefore,

H what must be referred to in the section as giving "by means of . . . the provision of security . . . financial assistance". It is in that looser sense that the security is the means of giving financial assistance within the meaning of the section; and this is so even if "security" is interpreted as the document by which this security is given and under which the payment is made. Moreover, in that looser sense, its being the means of giving financial assistance does not depend on

I its being valid, at any rate, when the financial assistance is in fact given. Indeed, the greater the invalidity the greater the assistance, because the less the liability to repay.

I would very readily believe, as ROXBURGH, J., has arrived at an opposite conclusion, that this reasoning is erroneous. Assuming that it is erroneous, it nevertheless does not seem to me necessary to follow from ROXBURGH, (189) (Nov. 1961), unreported.

J.'s observations (194) which I have quoted, that a loan by a company of money as a part of a transaction by which that money is to purchase, and does purchase, shares in the company is a valid loan. Such a loan, unlike the debenture in the Victor Battery case (195) is a transfer of the purchase money of the shares, and the transfer is nonetheless effective because the loan is invalid. If such a loan is valid, then it seems to me that it can only be on the ground that the section itself establishes that, despite its declaring it unlawful for a company to give by means of a loan financial assistance for the purchase of shares in the company, yet the ordinary consequences of such illegality are not to follow. Statute, of course, could so provide expressly or by implication.

References in the Victor Battery judgment (196) might be called in aid of such a conclusion. (i) That s. 45 of the Companies Act, 1929 (the predecessor of s. 54 of the Act of 1948) unlike s. 79, does not indicate an intention to avoid the security. Section 79 (now replaced by s. 95 of the Act of 1948 (197)) was not, however, dealing with illegality, whose consequences are well established under the general law, but with registration of charges, where the consequences of non-registration were not provided by the general law and, therefore, had to be provided in the statute. (ii) That the section does not indicate an intention to punish the lender. This is unless, be it added (as in our case) the lender is the company: so the lender in our case does not come within this observation. (iii) That to destroy the security, which may be for very large amounts, is out of all proportion to the £100 fine imposed by s. 54. This is a common well-recognised consequence accepted by the courts in cases of transactions being made unlawful and participants being subjected to relatively light criminal punishment. That such provisions might prove a positive boon to the principal offenders has been similarly accepted on the well-accepted ground of public policy that the courts will not aid unlawful transactions but let the consequences fall where they lie. (iv) That a person with "knowledge of what the principal offender is doing" may suffer far more than the principal offender. This is subject to the same observation as in (iii); and the lender would have the "knowledge". (v) The section was designed against the use of cash in shell companies to purchase the shares of those companies. That would, if the plaintiff company establishes its allegations, place the defendants within the design of the section. If the section can be interpreted so as to exclude what is within this design and to exclude what is outside it, then effect can be given to the distinction, but no-one has suggested such an interpretation; and in its absence there appears no good reason for relying on it in some way to exclude the Victor Battery case (195) any more than to include what, ex hypothesi, on interpretation is indistinguishable from it, namely the present case. It is with hesitation and misgiving that I come to a conclusion different from that of ROXBURGH, J. (195), but I must state what I see, however faulty my sight.

For my part, I conclude that the loan by the plaintiff company to Woodstock and the payment of the £207,500 by the plaintiff company to Mr. Burden were made unlawful and avoided by s. 54; but for reasons already given this conclusion does not, in my view, defeat the plaintiff company's claims in this case.

9. Section 448 of the Companies Act, 1948.

Those defendants who were directors of the plaintiff (i.e., Mr. Barlow-Lawson, Mr. Jacob, Mr. Burden and Mr. Sinclair) rely in their defence on s. 448 of the Companies Act, 1948. That section provides:

"(1) If in any proceeding for negligence, default, breach of duty or breach of trust against an officer of a company or a person employed by a company as auditor (whether he is or is not an officer of the company) it appears to the court hearing the case that that officer or person is or may be

(197) For s. 95, see 3 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 533.

A liable in respect of the negligence, default, breach of duty or breach of trust, but that he has acted honestly and reasonably, and that, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, including those connected with his appointment, he ought fairly to be excused for the negligence, default, breach of duty or breach of trust, that court may relieve him, either wholly or partly, from his liability on such terms as the court may think fit."

B There are, therefore, three requirements for relief, namely that the defendant (i) acted honestly, (ii) acted reasonably, and (iii) ought fairly to be excused.

The breach of trust relied on is a dishonest breach of trust. Mr. Burden I have held liable for such a breach and, therefore, he is outside the requirements of s. 448. Similarly, in my view, Mr. Sinclair is also outside its requirements. For Mr. Barlow-Lawson and Mr. Jacob, however, it may be said that their responsibility for the dishonest breach was because they put themselves at Mr. Cradock's disposal as I have described; and, as I have indicated, it is the alternative view in the case of Mr. Sinclair that he similarly put himself at the disposal of Mr. Burden. Even assuming that this participation in the breach was not dishonest within the section, yet for them, as directors of a public company, to dispose of large sums, constituting virtually the whole of the plaintiff company's assets, without any regard whatsoever for minority shareholders, and without consideration, but blindly at the behest of the majority shareholder who nominated them to the board, is not to act reasonably. Nor should they fairly be excused.

D I have no hesitation in concluding that none of them comes within the requirements of s. 448 and that they should not be relieved under its provisions.

E THE OVERALL RESULT

The overall result, therefore, is that the plaintiff company succeeds in its claims based on the first transaction and fails in its claims based on the second transaction (198). So it succeeds: (i) against Contanglo as constructive trustee to repay £195,000 with interest; (ii) against District as constructive trustee to repay £232,500 with interest and for damages for negligence; (iii) F against Woodstock as constructive trustee to repay £232,500 with interest; (iv) against Mr. Barlow-Lawson and Mr. Jacob as directors and trustees to pay £232,500 with interest.

This is no more than an indication of the result. The form of order which will work out the result with precision I will, as I have indicated, deal with after the parties have had an opportunity of considering the judgment. I will G then also deal with the plaintiff company's claim for expenses and with costs.

Order accordingly.

HEATON (Inspector of Taxes) v. BELL.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Danckwerts, Salmon and Fenton Atkinson, L.JJ.), May 7, 8, 9, 1968.]

Income Tax—Income Perquisites or profits of office or employment—Car loan scheme for employees—Adjustment of employee's wage to meet cost—Scheme terminable by fourteen days' notice—Adjustment was a reduction of wage rate, not a deduction from wages—Car loan not a taxable perquisite of employment—Income Tax Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2 c. 10), s. 156 (Sch. E), as amended—Finance Act, 1956 (4 & 5 Eliz. 2 c. 54), s. 10, Sch. 2, para. 1.

A printing company operated a voluntary car loan scheme for employees earning less than £2,000 a year. Under the scheme the company lent each participating employee a car of his selection, and paid full comprehensive insurance and road tax for each year and the cost of decarbonising in the second year. The employee provided petrol, oil, grease and other incidentals and provided cleaning and running maintenance. He signed a memorandum of terms of service under which "an amended wage basis" came into operation when the scheme was applied, and the employee received a weekly wage reduced by a sum of £2 10s. later increased to £2 18s. a week in a particular case (there were several references to reduction of wages in the documents relating to the scheme). No provision was made for payment of the reduction during absence through illness (when no wages were payable). The employee was to make use of the car for the more efficient discharge of his duties, was not to permit any other person to drive or use it except in an emergency, was to keep it clean and in good condition and to hold it ready for inspection at any time. Either the company or the employee could cancel the obligation or authority to use the car by giving fourteen days' notice, when the car was to be returned to the company. The employee's original wage would then be restored. An employee within the scheme was assessed to income tax under Sch. E* to the Income Tax Act, 1952, as amended by the Finance Act, 1956, s. 10, Sch. 2, para. 1, on the basis that the benefit of having the car constituted a perquisite of his employment.

Held: the weekly sum (viz., the £2 10s., later £2 18s., weekly) was not part of the emoluments of the taxpayer from his employment within para. 1 of Sch. E to the Income Tax Act, 1952, as amended, for the following reasons—

(i) when the taxpayer entered the scheme there was a reduction in his wages, not a deduction from his gross wage after the gross wage was ascertained, and accordingly the weekly sum was not part of his gross wage for tax purposes (see p. 1162, letter H, p. 1166, letter E, and p. 1168, letter B, post).

(ii) the taxpayer's right to have the use of the car was not something that could be turned into money, for he was not to permit others to drive it and, if the right to use the car were cancelled by notice, the consequence would be that the right to use it ceased, not that the taxpayer thereby converted his former right into increased wages: accordingly the right to use the car was not a taxable perquisite (see p. 1166, letter B, p. 1167, letter I, and p. 1168, letter D, post).

Tennant v. Smith ((1892), 3 Tax Cas. 158) and Abbott v. Philbin (Inspector of Taxes) ([1960] 2 All E.R. 763) applied.

D Case Stated.

- D The taxpayer appealed to the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts against an assessment made on him under Sch. E to the Income Tax Act, 1952, for the year 1963-64 in the sum of £1,532, less agreed expenses of £11 and superannuation payments of £7. The question for determination was whether or not the sums of £2 10s. per week up to May 31, 1963, and £2 18s. thereafter, being the amount of car loan scheme adjustments, were correctly
 E included in computing the taxpayer's emoluments from his employment within the meaning of para. 1 of Sch. E*. The taxpayer contended before the commissioners as follows. (i) That the company which employed him had given him the choice between receiving his wages in money only or wages in money of a reduced amount and the use of a car. The taxpayer agreed to enter the company's
 F car loan scheme whereby he obtained the use of a car and suffered a reduction in his monetary wage. (ii) That the taxpayer was not an employee who came within the provisions of s. 163 of the Income Tax Act, 1952. (iii) That the taxpayer was precluded, under the terms of the company's car loan scheme, from allowing anyone else to make use of the car except in an emergency so that while the taxpayer remained in the scheme the use of the car could not be turned into
 G money. (iv) That even if the use of the car had a monetary value then the amount chargeable to tax was what the taxpayer, as employee, could get for it, which was nil, and not the cost of the scheme to the company. The Crown contended before the commissioners as follows. (a) That on authority, as the deduction in arriving at the net wage paid to the taxpayer was variable, and the net wage could not be arrived at until the gross wage had been determined, the taxpayer's emoluments
 H were the gross wage before any deduction for the use of the car. (b) That in any event the taxpayer's emoluments were to be arrived at before taking into account the deduction for the use of the car. (c) That, in the alternative, if the true wage were a net wage plus the use of the car, then the use of the car was money's worth because the taxpayer could surrender his rights under the contract and so revert to his former wage and turn the benefit to pecuniary account.

- I The commissioners found† that the taxpayer's wage was the taxable gross wage excluding the sum by which it was reduced in respect of the car loan scheme and that the use of the car was not money's worth. They allowed the taxpayer's appeal and reduced the assessment to the £1,385. On July 11, 1967, as reported at [1968] 1 All E.R. 857, UNGOED-THOMAS, J., allowed the Crown's appeal against that decision, holding that, while the weekly sum in respect of the car loan scheme was not part of the taxpayer's wage (which was reduced by that amount), yet the car loan to the taxpayer was a perquisite of money's worth, because it could be turned to account by the taxpayer's giving notice to determine the loan and reverting to receiving a wage that would be increased by the amount of the weekly sum. The taxpayer appealed to the Court of Appeal. A

† The full terms of the commissioners' decision are set out at p. 1162, letters B to D, post.

DANCKWERTS, L.J.: This is an appeal against the judgment of UNGOED-THOMAS, J. (1), dated July 11, 1967, by which he affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax, given at a hearing on Mar. 1, 1966, on one point and disagreed with them on the second point. The question arises in regard to the use of a motor car which the taxpayer's employers allowed him to have on certain terms and conditions. Mr. Bell, the taxpayer, was a machine-minder in the lithographic department of John Waddington, Ltd., and he earned a substantial wage because, as is stated by the commissioners in the Case Stated, he was assessed under Sch. E to the Income Tax Act, 1952, for the year 1963-64 in the sum of £1,532 (less agreed expenses of £11 and superannuation payments of £7). Then, as a result of the freedom from taxation of the sums which he paid in respect of the use of the motor car, he was reduced to a figure of £1,385. He D was paid a weekly wage on the basis of so much an hour, and overtime at the rate of time and a quarter, and he had a bonus and certain other things.

The first, and main, question is whether the sum which he had to pay, or to allow for, or which was otherwise dealt with in respect of the use of the motor car, which varied from about £2 9s. a week to a larger sum at various times of his employment, was to be taken as part of the calculations which resulted in the amount of his total wage; i.e., whether it was a reduction of his gross wage for taxation purposes, or whether it was a deduction from his wages, made after the wage had been ascertained. That was the first point in the case. The other point which arises before the decision of the first point is whether his perquisite, or profit, as part of the emoluments which he had, was capable of being evaluated, and was taxable. E

I must turn now to the Case Stated. I think I can start with para. 4: F

"The [taxpayer] was at all material times employed by the company as a machine-minder in the lithographic department. (5) In 1954 the company decided to introduce a voluntary car loan scheme for the benefit of certain employees who earned less than £2,000 a year and who were not directors of the company." G

That is a reference to certain limitations of allowances which appear in the relevant Act. "The managing director wrote to each employee who was eligible to join in the scheme as follows: " I do not think that I need read the letter: it was rather a flowery one, no doubt full of good stuff, which does not, I think, matter for the purposes of this case. Then a document was disclosed which is in the Case Stated: H

"Private and Confidential. Waddingtons craftsmen's car loan service. Conditions. (1) John Waddington, Ltd., will loan a new car (Ford Popular—Austin A30—Ford Anglia or Morris 8) selected by the proposed user. (2) John Waddington, Ltd., will pay full comprehensive insurance for each year of the service. (£15 per annum). (3) John Waddington, Ltd., will pay the road tax for each year of the service. (£12 10s. per annum). (4) John Waddington, Ltd., will arrange for the decarbonising of the car during the second year. (5) The user will sign a simple agreement. [I think this next one is important.] (6) An amended wage basis will come into operation if the application is accepted. (7) The user will provide his own petrol, oil, grease and other incidentals. (8) The user will provide for cleaning and I

- A running maintenance. (9) If the car is under repair for maintenance or following an accident the amended wage basis will still apply. (10) Completion of application form does not mean acceptance by the company. They reserve full discretion on each application."

That is signed "John Waddington, Ltd.". Then the document continues:

- B "(b) A memorandum of terms of service to be signed by an employee who wished to join the scheme. (Para. (6), below). (c) An application form to be filled in and signed by an employee who wished to join the scheme. (para. (6), below). When in 1954 the scheme was finally settled, a meeting was arranged for all the company's employees concerned to hear the details of how the scheme would operate. (6) The [taxpayer] attended the meeting of employees in 1954 when the scheme was introduced but did not join the scheme until 1961. In the meantime the [taxpayer] did not attend any further meetings in connexion with the scheme but all relevant information was circulated to the employees and detailed information could be obtained if desired. On Feb. 10, 1961, the [taxpayer] signed an application form to join the scheme. A copy of the [taxpayer's] application form is annexed hereto . . . The [taxpayer] selected an Austin A40 de luxe car and on Mar. 3, 1961, signed a 'memorandum of terms of service'. A copy of the [taxpayer's] memorandum of terms of service is annexed hereto, marked B [cf., p. 1161, letters E and F, post] and forms part of this Case."

I will deal with the documents presently. I think, it is more convenient to go on with the reading of the Case Stated:

- E "On May 30, 1961, Mr. H. D. Brearley, the officer of the company in charge of the scheme wrote to Mr. Stephens, the secretary of the company, as follows: 'Craftsmen's car service. The Austin A.40 de luxe car reg. No. 3248 RO recently delivered has been allocated to [the taxpayer]. [The taxpayer] is a newcomer on the scheme and I am sending with this letter his signed agreement form and his completed application form fully approved. He would like to take the car away today at 5.15 p.m. and if you will let me have the usual note saying that the car is insured, I will see that it is handed over to him.' On the same day, May 30, 1961, Mr. Stephens wrote to Mrs. Nicholson of the company's wages office, as follows: 'Dear Mrs. Nicholson, A new car has been made available to the following person(s). Will you please arrange the necessary weekly wage reduction. Craftsman: '—and it is the second one—[the taxpayer] [and there is a space for clock No.] 'On and from: Pay day Friday, June 2, 1961. Yours sincerely.'
- G "The 'necessary weekly wage reduction' made in respect of the [taxpayer's] Austin A.40 car, registered No. 3248 RO was £2 9s., first applied on pay day Friday, June 2, 1961. The Austin car was handed over to the
- H [taxpayer] on May 30, 1961. The company made a summary giving details of each of the cars supplied and the weekly wage reductions of some of its employees under the craftsmen's car scheme. A copy of the company's summary in respect of the [taxpayer] from Feb. 20, 1961, to June 5, 1964, is annexed hereto marked C [see p. 1161, letters G to I, post] and forms part of this Case. The company also kept a register of the cars supplied to craftsmen
- I and an extract showing details of the Austin car No. 3248 RO is annexed hereto, marked D [see p. 1161, letter I, post] and forms part of this Case."

And then on Feb. 26, 1962, Mr. Brearley wrote a letter to all the employees in the scheme, saying that for various reasons the costs had gone up and therefore the amount which was material in reference to the use of the car had to be increased. I do not think I need read that.

"The effect of this alteration in the rate on the [taxpayer's] weekly wage reduction was to increase the amount to £2 14s. 6d. from Apr. 1, 1962. On June 1, 1962, the Austin car being one year old the [taxpayer's] wage reduction was amended to £2 10s." A

That means that as the car was older—it was, I think, only in the scheme two years—the charge, or the payment relating to it was reduced.

"The memorandum from the secretarial department to the wages office effecting this change read as follows: 'Adjustment to craftsman's wages. Name: [the taxpayer]. Whether in scheme already: Yes. Adjustment required: £2 10s. with effect from pay week ended June 1, 1962'." B

And then para. (8).

"At the end of May, 1963, the Austin being two years old, the [taxpayer] arranged with Mr. Brearley to exchange it for a Morris 1100 de luxe, reg. No. 330 RAR. (An extract from the register giving details of this car is in exhibit D.) The [taxpayer] signed an amendment to his memorandum of terms of service (exhibit B) to cover the Morris car. The [taxpayer's] wage reduction was amended to £2 18s. The memorandum from the secretarial department effecting this change is mutatis mutandis the same as that mentioned in para. (7). C

"(9) Each employee of the company received a weekly pay slip showing the wages to which he was entitled. The [taxpayer's] pay slip for the week ending June 5, 1964, was taken as an example of the manner in which the company calculated the wages of its employees. The figures for that week were set out thereon as follows: (1) Flat rate, forty-three hours, £22 6s. 7d.; (2) Overtime premium, 2.0625 hours, £1 5s. 7d.; (3) Cost of living bonus, 11s. 8d.; (4) shift premium, £4 9s. 4d.; (5) Bonus, £4 12s. 8d.; (6) Spray or hair money, 3s. 4d.; (7) Holiday pay, blank, and £33 9s. 2d. is an addition of the items that appear from (1) to (6); and then comes £2 13s. 6d. which is the sum relating to the car. There is then a line and the reduction, or deduction, as the case may be, is made, resulting in a figure of £30 15s. 8d. which is described as 'taxable gross wage'. Then there come: 'Standard deductions, £1 17s.; graduated pension contribution, 7s. 8d.; P.A.Y.E. £2 3s.' D amounting in all to £4 7s. 8d., which is deducted, showing a net wage of £26 8s. A copy of the pay slip is annexed. E

"The taxpayer's weekly wage reduction under the scheme is shown in the pay slip as £2 13s. 6d., item number 8, which was the only deduction in arriving at the taxable gross wage, items 2 to 6 being additions to the flat rate of £22 6s. 7d. for forty-three hours' work. The wage reduction had been amended to this figure on the car becoming one year old in a manner as described in paras. (7) and (8) above. F

"The [taxpayer] was paid the flat rate per hour which was standard for his classification. The overtime premium was calculated at one and a quarter times the flat rate. The cost of living bonus was fixed each January. The shift premium was paid for shift work and was calculated on the basis of the flat rate. The bonus figure was calculated on production figures but came in one week later than the flat rate of wages." G

Then there is para. (10), which I must read, which dealt with the case where the employee was absent through sickness, and that sort of thing: H

"Whenever an employee was absent through sickness and received no wage, no deduction was made for the use of the car because the agreement between the company and the employee under the scheme was that the employee should accept a reduced wage. If there was no wage it could not be reduced and no adjustment of any kind was made under the scheme. The [taxpayer's] pay slip for the week ending Dec. 13, 1963, when the [taxpayer] was absent through sickness was in the same form as exhibit C, but with an I

A entry only for one item (number 5) being a bonus of £2 8s. 10d. which related to the previous week. No wage reduction was made under the scheme and the taxable gross wage was shown as £2 8s. 10d. The pay slip for the week ending Nov. 8, 1963, shows similarly no reduction where there was no wage. Copies of the [taxpayer's] pay slips for the weeks ending Dec. 13, 1963, and Nov. 8, 1963, are annexed.

B “(11) In his evidence the [taxpayer] stated that if he had ever been asked whether the company supplied him with a car at a rent deducted from his wage he would have said that he had accepted instead a lower wage and a car free. He admitted that he had probably made a rough estimate of what it would cost to obtain the use of a car but added that his main concern had been to see whether he could afford to run a car. The [taxpayer] did not agree that in order to check his wages he would have to calculate the wage he would have received if he had not joined the scheme and then make a deduction for the car. As the figures were all set out on the pay slip all that he had to do was to check the arithmetic.

C “The [taxpayer] understood the last two lines of the memorandum of terms of service to mean that the agreement could be cancelled by either party giving fourteen days' notice, and that if it were cancelled he would receive his former wage without any deduction.”

D I should now turn to the exhibits or annexures. I do not think that I need bother with A. B reads:

E “Memorandum of terms of service. During my service with you as lithographer and the carrying out of the various duties you properly assign to me, I am to make use of motor car No. 3248 RO for the more efficient discharge of my duties. I am not to permit anyone other than myself to drive or use the car except in an emergency. I am to pay for maintenance and running. I agree to keep the car clean and in good condition and to hold it ready for inspection at any time. You have generously agreed to licence and insure the car and to pay for decarbonisation when necessary. Either of us may cancel my obligation and authority to use the car on fourteen days' notice. Dated Mar. 3, 1961,”

F and that is signed by the employee.

Then annexure C has the heading:

G “John Waddington, Ltd. Craftsmen's car scheme. Ralph Garland Bell, litho machine minder of 19, Howard Avenue, Halton, Leeds, 15. Signed application form Feb. 10, 1961. Signed memorandum of terms of service Mar. 3, 1961. New Austin A.50 de luxe car 3248 RO handed over to R.G.B. on Tuesday, May 30, 1961.”

H Then there come certain things which, though these are statements in documents of the employers, seem to me to have some relevance: “Wage reduction 49s. per week first applied pay day Friday, June 2, 1961”; ditto ditto “increased to 54s. 6d. per week on pay day Friday, Apr. 6, 1962 (general increase)”; ditto ditto “changed to 50s. per week on pay day Friday, June 1, 1962”; ditto ditto

I “changed to 45s. 6d. per week on pay day Friday, June 7, 1963. R.G.B. handed in 3248 RO and collected new Morris 1100 de luxe 330 RAR on Friday, May 31, 1963. Wage reduction changed to 58s. per week on Friday, June 7, 1963; wage reduction changed to 53s. 6d. per week on Friday, June 5, 1964.”

Then there are certain things on D, but I do not think anything turns on D. It merely records the sale of the Austin on June 27, 1963. I do not find anything much on item D, except that the words “Reduction (1st yr.) (2nd yr.) (3rd yr.) (4th yr.)” appear and seem to me consistent with the other documents in the case.

Those being the facts, I can pass by the contentions, the cases which were referred to, and the reference to the statement by ROWLATT, J., in Machon v. McLoughlin (2) which I do not propose to refer to. I come now to p. 14, where the conclusions appear of the Special Commissioners:

"On the facts of this case it seems to us that the wage is what it is said to be on the pay slip dated June 5, 1964 (exhibit E), namely the taxable gross wage, that is to say the sum of the items (1) to (6), less item (8). On this basis we have to consider whether the use of the car is money's worth. We have to bear in mind the cases of Tennant v. Smith (3) and Wilkins (Inspector of Taxes) v. Rogerson (4), the latter being the case of the suit from Montague Burton, Ltd. Now here we think that the position is distinguishable from the case of Abbott v. Philbin (Inspector of Taxes) (5) [which was the case where an employee had an option to obtain shares]. The use of the company's car is not an option and we think that the question is whether the [taxpayer] in having the use of the car has money's worth. From the memorandum of terms of service (exhibit B) the [taxpayer] was not to permit anyone else but himself to drive or use the car except in an emergency. In these circumstances the use of the car is not in our view money's worth. Accordingly we hold that the appeal succeeds in principle and as the figures have been agreed between the parties we reduce the 1963-64 assessment on the [taxpayer] to £1,385."

That is the decision of the Special Commissioners.

The case came before UNGOED-THOMAS, J. (6). As I have indicated, UNGOED-THOMAS, J., affirmed the decision of the commissioners on one point. He held that it was a reduction in reaching the assessable wage of the taxpayer and was not a deduction from his wage after it had been ascertained. That, I think, states shortly the effect of the question decided, and the effect of the commissioners' and the judge's decision, and I will just read one paragraph from the judge's judgment (7):

"In particular the reference in the condition, originally mentioned in the letter introducing the scheme to the employee, to 'an amended wage basis' coming into operation, and the fact that, in the inter-party pay slip, the only provision for payment was accordingly made by way of subtraction from wages without any provision for payment even in respect of a week when no wage was earned, seem to me, despite the impressive considerations which have been urged on behalf of the Crown, to establish that the true view of this transaction is that there was one contract for payment of the wage less an amount to be calculated in arriving at that wage, and not two contracts, one for the payment of the wage and an entirely separate contract for the deduction of an amount from that wage after it had been calculated."

That seems to me to be a correct view. It seems to me that all the documents show, in the course of events between the parties, that there was an alteration from the wage structure when the taxpayer took advantage of the scheme and obtained the use of this car. That being so, the first question naturally must fall, I think, to be decided against the contention of the Crown, in that it is a reduction in the wage receivable by the taxpayer and therefore was not to be taken into consideration as a part of his gross wages out of which he made a payment by way of deduction which then, in that case, forms part of his taxable wage.

The second question, however, as it seems to me, gives considerably more trouble. Much of the relevant statutory provision applicable to the case is set out

A by the judge (8), and I think that it would be a good thing to understand what we are talking about in that case. The judge said (8):

“Section 156, Income Tax Act, 1952, provides: ‘... shall be charged’ under Case 1, on ‘emoluments for the year of assessment’; and the Finance Act, 1956, Sch. 2, para. 1, provides, inter alia: ‘... the expression “emoluments” shall include all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites and profits whatsoever.’ The contention put forward before me by the Crown was a contention which was put forward before the commissioners, and the judge quotes: ‘that ... if the true wage was a net wage plus the use of the car, then the use of the car was money’s worth because the [taxpayer] could surrender his rights under the contract and by this revert to his former wage and turn the benefit into pecuniary account.’ The commissioners’ observations were: ‘From the memorandum of terms of service ... the [taxpayer] was not to permit anyone else but himself to drive or use the car except in an emergency. In these circumstances the use of the car is not in our view money’s worth.’”

D Now I want to make a few observations with regard to that. If one considers the plain and strong terms by which the taxpayer had use of this car, he could not get money by selling it. He could not sell it, because in fact it was the property of the company who brought about the scheme, who thereby got a capital allowance of some sort under the rules relating to tax; he could not let it out on hire. He could not make money in that way any more than there was any way in which he could pass the use of the car, or part with possession of the car, at all.

E The point which was made was that he might, perhaps, undertake to drive people about the country, or something of that sort, but I think that on a proper construction of the terms on which the car was presented to him he was not entitled to do that; he should entirely use it for his own family purposes, and, therefore, it was not a case where the car was to be used for work purposes, or anything of that sort. He simply had the benefit of the use of the car, and, of course, it might save him, it is quite true, some expenses such as ‘bus fares, perhaps, and shoe leather, and that sort of thing, but I do not think that was really the basis of the value of the car which could be based on money terms. Our trouble is really whether it was possible to assess the value to this employee of the opportunity to use the car.

F I will read on, because the judge accepted, I think, that contention just recently raised on behalf of the Crown, and reached what seems to me a very odd conclusion. He said (9):

G “That was not directed to the contention put forward by the Crown. The commissioners arrived at their conclusion, without dealing with the Crown’s contention, on a basis which, as I understand it, was not put before them by the Crown, nor put before me by the Crown. The taxpayer, whilst also accepting that, to be taxable, the perquisite must be money or money’s worth convertible into money, puts his case in two ways. It is said, first, that the documents we are dealing with here, particularly the Case Stated, show that the employee was paid weekly, that the car could not be turned into money in any one week, and that, therefore, in any one week there was here no money’s worth because the car loan could not be turned into money in that week. The short answer to that is that the assessment is made upon ‘emoluments ... for the year of assessment’. The relevance of the perquisite is that it is contained in the definition of ‘emoluments’, so we are dealing with ‘perquisites for the year of assessment’. Therefore, the taxpayer could, after fourteen days’ notice in the year, turn it into money, if it could be turned into money at all.”

(8) [1968] 1 All E.R. at p. 866.

(9) [1968] 1 All E.R. at pp. 866, 867.

Well, the last observation, I think, is the one which is correct; it could not be turned into money at all. I think that the statement that it could be turned into money by terminating the use of the car is based—with due respect to the judge—on a complete fallacy. When one determines the use of the car one gives up the car; one no longer has that perquisite of the car; one simply has not got the car any more. It passes out of the picture, and what happens is that the wage which the taxpayer was originally entitled to will be based on the ordinary terms of service which will come from the company concerned. That does not seem to me to be converting the use of the car into money, but it is a parting with the car; he has the car no more, and, of course, he cannot pass any relevant consideration, as far as I can see. I find myself quite unable to accept that reasoning by the judge for the purposes of this case.

There was discussion in this case whether it might not be right to take into consideration, in arriving at the value of the perquisite of the use of the car, that it might be said to be money's worth in that it should be fixed by regard to the money which was paid by the employers. There was a case of Wilkins (Inspector of Taxes) v. Rogerson (10), in the reports of which I appeared as the judge of first instance, and I was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. It concerned a claim by which a particular company provided suits for its employees from Montague Burton, Ltd., well known in that line. The suits which were provided cost the company, the employers, £14 15s., and the question was whether the employee was assessable on that sum of £14 15s. or not, and the decision of myself and the Court of Appeal was: not so; the amount of the benefit he got was its value if he had turned the suit into money. It was apparently agreed, or established, that when he got the suit it would then become a second hand suit and he could sell it for £5, and accordingly he was to be assessed on that £5 figure, but not on the price of £14 15s.

Of course that case does not involve, really, the same sort of considerations as the present one at all, because, not being able to sell, or hire out, or do anything else in any other way with the car, one could not get any figure approaching or in any way relating to the amount that it cost. In the course of argument which came before me I said this (10):

“Well, possibly if you could not find any other standard, the amount of the value of the perquisite which the employee had must be judged by the amount which has been spent on it by his employers.”

That was rather echoed, I think, in the Court of Appeal by LORD EVERSHED, M.R.

Another case which has been discussed was Nicoll (Inspector of Taxes) v. Austin (11), in which the managing director of a company was occupying a house with amenities such as a very good garden, and so on. It was the intention of his company that he should live there, and, he, finding it expensive to keep up, and the company, regarding it as a matter of prestige that he, the managing director, should occupy that house and garden, agreed to reimburse him for the money he had to spend in keeping it up in that way. The true situation was put by DONOVAN, L.J., in Wilkins (Inspector of Taxes) v. Rogerson (12) when he pointed out that the proper method of calculating the taxable amount in Nicoll (Inspector of Taxes) v. Austin (11) was not on the amount which was paid by the employers but the amount of the remuneration of the managing director which was reimbursed by the company of which he was managing director.

Be that as it may, it would be very difficult to evaluate what was the money's worth, if any, of the car to the employee in the present case, because it seems to me in the first place quite clear that it was not the amount which the employee

(10) [1960] 1 All E.R. 650; 39 Tax Cas. 344; affd., [1961] 1 All E.R. 358; 39 Tax Cas. at p. 350.

A was charged with. If that standard was to be applied, however, it must be the payments which were made for the benefit of the employee by the company. That would not be the capital amount which would be spent on the perquisite in question, but it could possibly be interest on that sum; it would no doubt be the payments for insurance and road tax, and decarbonising, and perhaps interest on the capital expenditure by the company. That would be not only
 B difficult to assess but it seems to me it would also mean that the case would have to be remitted to the special commissioners to find the amount.

A case was mentioned by SALMON, L.J., which, it seems to me at any rate, renders that mode of assessing the value not admissible for the purposes of this case. That is the case of Abbott v. Philbin (Inspector of Taxes) (13), which was a case in the House of Lords, and the passage I would refer to in the speech of C LORD RADCLIFFE is this (14):

"The difficulty in dealing with this point lies wholly in relating words used by several members of the House in Tennant v. Smith (15) apparently of general import, to circumstances that they were not dealing with. The benefit of a right of occupation of part of bank premises which the occupier could only enjoy for the service of the bank is not very like the benefit of an option to take up freely transferable shares at a fixed price. The basis of the Revenue's claim in Tennant v. Smith (15) was really to tax the bank manager on expenditure which he was saved, not on any money that he got or could get, while tax on the full annual value of the premises was taken from the bank itself. It was not, however, the view of the House that profits or perquisites, to be taxable, could consist only of money paid. It was accepted that they could include objects or things of value received, payments in kind, so long as they were 'capable of being turned into money' (LORD HALSBURY, L.C., (16) 'money—or that which can be turned to pecuniary account' LORD WATSON (17), 'money payment or payments convertible into money' LORD MACNAGHTEN (18), 'that which could be converted into money' LORD HANNEN (19)).

"I think that it has been generally assumed that this decision does impose a limitation on the taxability of benefits in kind which are of a personal nature, in that it is not enough to say that they have a value to which there can be assigned a monetary equivalent. If they are by their nature incapable of being turned into money by the recipient they are not taxable, even though they are, in any ordinary sense of the word of value to him. It is obvious that this conception raises many attendant uncertainties which are not, so far as I know, cleared up except where some particular class of benefit in kind has offended the eye of the legislature and has been dealt with by special legislation. Must the inconvertibility arise from the nature of the thing itself, or can it be imposed merely by contractual stipulation? Does it matter that the circumstances are such that conversion into money is a practical, though not a theoretical, impossibility; or, on the other hand, that conversion, though forbidden, is the most probable assumption?

"I do not think that the decision of this case can go very far, if any distance, to clear up such points as these. I think that the Crown are right in saying that a line has to be drawn somewhere between convertible and non-convertible benefits and that, somehow, we have to put a general meaning on the not very precise language used in Tennant v. Smith (20).

What I do not think, however, is that a non-assignable option to take up freely assignable shares lies on that side of the line which contains untaxable benefits in kind."

I should say that the other law lords in the case which I have just been citing took very much the same view as LORD RADCLIFFE. That seems to me to dispose of the second point in this case. I find it impossible to say that the benefits obtained from the use of this car can be turned into money, and that they can be evaluated. In those circumstances they fall on the other side of the line referred to by LORD RADCLIFFE, and they are not taxable. It seems to me that the Special Commissioners reached the right conclusion on this point as well as on the first point, and that the judge, I am afraid, was wrong in his decision in reversing that determination. It seems to me that the appeal succeeds on the second point. The first point was rightly decided both by the Special Commissioners and by the judge, but on the second point the judge was wrong, and the appeal must be allowed in favour of the taxpayer on that point.

SALMON, L.J.: I agree and add only a few words since we are differing from the judge (21). The first point seems to me to come to this: was the taxpayer's remuneration £x a week, from which the employers retained £y in respect of the use of the car which they put at his disposal, or was the taxpayer's remuneration £x minus £y a week, plus the use of the car? In other words, did the element in respect of the use of the car constitute a deduction from, or a reduction in, his wages? If it was a deduction from his wages it is undoubtedly taxable.

I agree with DANCKWERTS, L.J., that on the documents there is an inescapable inference that the £y element to which I have referred was in truth a reduction in his wages. When the letter was written by the managing director in 1954 to all the employees including the present taxpayer, offering them participation in the scheme to which DANCKWERTS, L.J., has referred, it made it quite plain that it was a condition of the scheme that if the employee joined his wages would be varied. The words of the circular letter were: "An amended wage basis will come into operation if the application is accepted." The taxpayer did apply to join the scheme, by the notice which he served some seven years later, on Feb. 10, 1961. Presumably he was then agreeing to an amended wage basis.

It is permissible to observe, although I do not think much importance can be attached to it, that in the employers' internal documents what I call the £y element is in every document referred to as a reduction in wages. What is more important than the internal documents, however, is the pay slip for June 5, 1964, which we have seen, and which I think it is fair to assume is a typical sample of the pay slips the taxpayer received week by week after he joined the scheme. This shows elements of remuneration in the first seven items, which add up in this particular week to £33 9s. 2d., but that figure is reduced by the £y element which in this week was £2 13s. 6d., so that the taxable gross wage is shown as the difference between the two. Then there are shown "standard deductions, graduated pension contribution", and "P.A.Y.E." and the net wage was £26 8s. Week after week this man accepted pay slips in that form, having signed an application to join the scheme which involved his wage basis being re-assessed. I think it is quite impossible, in those circumstances, to decide the first point in any other way than that in which it was decided by the commissioners and the judge (21).

The next point that arises is this: is the element of the taxpayer's remuneration which consists of the use of the car taxable? That depends on whether it was a "perquisite" within the meaning of that word in the Finance Act, 1956.

- A I should have thought, applying common sense (which is perhaps an uncertain guide in this branch of the law) that it was clearly a perquisite. There is no doubt but that it was money's worth. It has been argued, however, that it is only a perquisite within the meaning of the Act of 1956 if it is not only money's worth but also something which is convertible into money. I am bound to say that this, to me, is a strange concept which may lead to strange results. I can
- B imagine a case where an employer might pay a man a very small money wage, or, indeed, no remuneration in money, but supply him with a house and a motor-car, clothes, food and drink, perhaps, to a value of approaching £2,000 a year, and write into the contract of employment a clause that the man should not sell or turn any of these things into money, which probably in any event he would not intend to do. It would seem that in those circumstances he would be in
- C the fortunate position of not having to pay income tax.

- The doctrine that no form of remuneration is taxable unless it is something which is money or money's worth and convertible into money stems from the case of Tennant v. Smith (22), which was decided in the House of Lords as long ago as 1892. There are the dicta in the speeches of the distinguished members of the House in that case which clearly lay down the doctrine. Tennant v.
- D Smith (22), however, is quite obviously distinguishable from cases such as the present. The bank manager in that case did not occupy the house at the bank as any part of his remuneration. He was required to live in the house as part of his terms of service: all that he gained from this was the incidental benefit that it may have saved him some rent.

- I confess that I tried hard at one stage of this appeal to find some way of
- E adhering to what seemed to me to be reality, and holding that the use of the car was a perquisite which was certainly money's worth, and ought to be taxed, although it was not convertible into money. It is quite obvious however from what was said by the House of Lords in 1959 in Abbott v. Philbin (Inspector of Taxes (23), that such a finding is impossible. However distinguishable Tennant v. Smith (22) may be from cases such as the present, Abbott v. Philbin (23) makes
- F it plain that it has for years been recognised that the principles laid down in Tennant v. Smith (22) are of general application, and, in particular, that they do apply to cases such as the one which we are now considering. It is certainly far too late for the Court of Appeal, at any rate, to do anything about it.

- Since, therefore, what I have called the £y element is not taxable unless it is convertible into money, the third point is: is the judge's finding (24) that
- G it is convertible into money supportable? He took the view that this use of the car was convertible into money, because the taxpayer could give up the use of the car on a fourteen-day notice. Strangely, in my view, he thought that this perquisite should be taxable only for fifty weeks of the year but not for fifty-two weeks of the year, because of the fourteen-day notice. This is an approach which I am bound to say I am quite unable to understand, but, since
- H no-one has sought to support it in this court, I need not deal with it.

- At one stage I was in no way troubled by this point that the use of the car was convertible into money. It seemed to me that it was plainly wrong, and then counsel for the Crown did put a doubt in my mind, but I come back to my original view, with some reluctance. I do not think that it is possible to say that this taxpayer could have converted the use of the car into money. He
- I had the use of the car and he could give it up. He did not receive anything but the use of the car. If he gave up the use of the car it is true to say that there would have been another variation of his contract of employment and his weekly remuneration in money would have gone up by £y. I cannot, however, agree that in any true sense of the word he could convert the use of the car into money, and therefore I concur in allowing the appeal.

FENTON ATKINSON, L.J.: I would only add a word or two on the questions arising from this case. The first question, as I see it, is this: Is this a case where the taxpayer's wage was reduced by agreement, as he contends, or is it a case where the taxpayer was applying a part of his gross wage in a particular way, as the Crown say? In my view there is the clearest evidence to support the view of the Special Commissioners and the judge (25) that this was the case of a reduction of the gross wage by agreement, and I have nothing to add on that point to what my lords have said.

The second question is whether the use of the car was a perquisite within para. 1 of Sch. 2 to the Finance Act, 1956. On this question I agree with the view of the Special Commissioners and am unable to accept the judge's view (26). I reach that conclusion the more readily as it seemed to me that counsel for the Crown in this court scarcely sought to support the judgment of the court below (27). The perquisite which the Crown contends must be treated as a part of the emoluments, as I see it, is the use of the car for so long as the taxpayer enjoyed that use.

Apart from authority, I, myself, would be led astray into thinking that the use of the car represented money's worth to the taxpayer. He, at least, reckoned that it was worth either £2 10s. or £2 15s. a week. But the authorities establish beyond all argument that for a perquisite to become taxable it must be money's worth in the sense that it may be converted into money, and on the terms of the agreement between the employers and the taxpayer it is quite clear—and both sides agree—that the use of this car could not in any way be converted into money. For myself, I cannot see that the fact that the taxpayer could terminate his agreement for the use of the car, and thereafter enter into a fresh agreement for a higher wage, is relevant in deciding whether the use of the car was convertible into money.

As to the main argument that counsel for the Crown addressed to us on this second point, it seemed to me that he was really repeating the argument that counsel advanced to the Court of Appeal in Wilkins (Inspector of Taxes) v. Rogerson (28), according to LORD EVERSHED, M.R.'s note of the argument:

"I say . . . that where the employee accepts an offer from his employer to spend money on his behalf, then he is chargeable on the money spent, and not on the value of the thing bought for him."

That argument was expressly rejected by the Court of Appeal in that case. I agree this appeal must be allowed on the second point.

Appeal allowed on second point. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Reid, Lord Pearce, Lord Upjohn, Lord Wilberforce and Lord Pearson), March 12, 13, May 6, 7, 8, July 10, 1968.]

Building Contract—Breach of contract—Fitness or quality of materials—Two warranties implied, fitness for purpose and good quality—Sub-contract for work and materials—Defective materials supplied—Material specified by contractors, manufactured only by one manufacturer—Specified material obtained, but having undetectable defects, due to faulty manufacture, rendering it not of good quality—Material supplied and fixed by sub-contractor—Whether sub-contractor liable for supplying such material.

In a contract to do work and to supply materials two warranties may be implied in respect of the materials supplied, a warranty of their reasonable fitness for the purpose and a warranty of their good quality, in particular against latent defects*; where the materials are chosen by the party for whom the work is to be done, warranty of their fitness is not implied but, unless excluded by the circumstances (or by the terms of the contract), a warranty of quality will be implied (see p. 1173, letters D and H, p. 1175, letter B, p. 1176, letter I, to p. 1177, letter A, p. 1177, letter E, p. 1180, letter D, and p. 1181, letter B, post).

Dictum of DU PARCQ, J., in G. H. Myers & Co. v. Bent Cross Service Co. ([1933] All E.R. Rep. at pp. 13, 14) applied, but the illustration given at p. 14 doubted.

The respondent contractors, who were building dwelling-houses on their land, sub-contracted† the roofing to the appellants. The respondents specified that Somerset 13 tiles should be used for the roof. These tiles were made only by one manufacturer and in specifying these tiles the respondents' representative, who was highly skilled and experienced, relied on his own judgment and skill. The appellants sub-contracted the supplying and laying of the tiles; and this sub-contractor obtained the tiles from the manufacturer. Owing to some fault in the manufacture the tiles had a latent defect, not apparent on inspection, but which became apparent after they were fixed and exposed to weather. In answer to a claim by the respondents for damages suffered by reason of the defects in the tiles the appellants contended that, since the tiles were chosen by the respondents' representative and there was only one manufacturer of the tiles, there was no implied warranty of the fitness or quality of the tiles by the appellants.

Held: the appellants were liable in damages on an implied warranty of quality of the tiles, the fact that the tiles were obtainable only from one manufacturer being insufficient to negative the implication of the warranty (see p. 1172, letter H, p. 1173, letter H, p. 1175, letter E, p. 1177, letter F, p. 1178, letter B, and p. 1181 letters A and B, post).

Per LORD PEARCE: if it is known to both parties that the manufacturer gives no warranty to the contractor, that fact is a strong indication that no warranty is being given to the contractor (see p. 1175, letter D, post; cf., p. 1172, letter H, and p. 1181, letter B, post).

Decision of the COURT OF APPEAL (sub nom. Prior v. McManus Childs, Ltd. (Young & Marten, Ltd., Third Parties), [1967] 3 All E.R. 451) affirmed.

[Editorial Note.] This decision should be considered with that in Gloucester County Council v. Richardson, p. 1181.

As to obligations concerning workmanship and materials in building contracts, see 3 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 435, para. 818; 442, para. 837; and for cases on the subject, see 7 DIGEST (Repl.) 345-347, 35-48.]

* To use materials which appeared to be defective would be a breach of the contractual duty to exercise care and skill in the doing of the work (see p. 1174, letter B, post).

† The case was decided on the basis that there was a contract between the respondents and the appellants, though in fact the contract was not made by the respondents (see p. 1171, letter F, post).

Appeal.

This was an appeal by the appellants, Young and Marten, Ltd., from an order of the Court of Appeal (SELLERS, DAVIES and RUSSELL, L.J.J.), dated June 23, 1967, and reported [1967] 3 All E.R. 451, allowing the appeal of the respondents, McManus Childs, Ltd., against the decision of the official referee, His Honour NORMAN RICHARDS, Q.C., dated Oct. 6, 1966. The respondents carried on the business of builders and built in 1958 a group of houses for sale on land that they had acquired for the purpose. The building works were executed by a company known as Richard Saunders & Co., Ltd., which for the purposes of this case was treated as the agent of the respondents. The appellants contracted with R. Saunders & Co., Ltd., for supplying and fixing roofing tiles for the houses. On behalf of the company a Mr. J. Saunders, who was a director of the company and an experienced builder, had specified Somerset 13 tiles for the roofing. The appellants sub-contracted with Acme Roofing Co. (London), Ltd., for supplying and fixing Somerset 13 tiles. These tiles were made by one manufacturer only, John Browne & Co. (Bridgwater), Ltd., from which Acme Roofing Co. (London), Ltd. obtained the tiles. These tiles were generally of good quality but owing to some defect in the manufacture which could not have been detected by any reasonable examination before they were fixed, the particular tiles supplied began to laminate and shale during the winter next following the completion of the houses. The houses were sold to various purchasers seventeen of whom sued the respondents in the county court. The appellants were made third parties. The actions consolidated and ultimately were transferred to the official referee for trial. The official referee found in favour of the plaintiff purchasers against the respondents, awarding damages totalling £3,693. On Oct. 6, 1966,

A the official referee dismissed the third party proceedings brought by the respondents against the appellants, and subsequently the respondents' appeal was allowed by the Court of Appeal, as stated above.

Sir Joseph Molony, Q.C., and Quentin Edwards for the appellants.

C. J. S. French, Q.C., and S. G. Davies for the respondents.

B Their lordships took time for consideration.

July 10. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD REID: My Lords, some time before 1958 the respondents decided to build a number of houses for sale. They contracted with Saunders. Saunders then sub-contracted with the appellants for the roofing. There was a discussion about the type of tiles to be used and Saunders for "prestige" reasons decided to have a rather expensive type, Somerset 13, made by Browne of Bridgwater. I think that it is clear that Saunders, who was highly skilled and experienced, relied entirely on his own skill and judgment in making this decision. The appellants' representative agreed with his choice, but that does not appear to me to mean that Saunders relied to any extent on the judgment of the appellants' representative. The appellants then sub-contracted the tiling work to Acme, and Acme obtained the tiles from Browne.

The houses were completed and sold in 1958. But very soon these tiles began to give trouble. It is agreed that the defects in these tiles could not have been detected by any reasonable examination before they were fixed on the roofs; and it is agreed that generally these tiles are of good quality and that there must have been some fault in the manufacture of this batch. Various attempts were made to put matters right for which Browne assumed liability, but they were unavailing, and ultimately the owners of a number of the houses decided to re-roof them and successfully sued the respondents for the cost. The respondents brought in the appellants as liable to them on an implied warranty. Normally the appellants would then have brought in Acme and Acme would have brought in Browne; but before they could do so time had run out under the provisions of the Limitation Acts. For reasons which it is not material to consider this case is proceeding on the footing that, although there was in fact no contract between the appellants and the respondents, Saunders must be regarded as the respondents' agent who made a contract between them and the appellants.

This is a contract for the supply of work and materials and this case raises a general question as to the nature and extent of the warranties which the law implies in such a contract. As regards the contractor's liability for the work done there is no dispute in this case: admittedly it must be done with all proper skill and care. The question at issue relates to his liability in respect of material supplied by him under the contract. The appellants maintain that the warranty in respect of materials is similar to that in respect of work, so that, if the selection of material and of the person to supply it is left to the contractor, he must exercise due skill and care in choosing the material and the person to supply it; but where, as in this case, the material and the supplier were chosen by the respondents, the appellants maintain that there was no warranty as to the fitness or quality of the tiles. The respondents admit that, if it is held that the choice of this type of tile was theirs and theirs alone, there can be no implied warranty that this type of tile was fit for the contract purpose. But they say that there still was a warranty that the tiles would be of good quality and that that warranty must be implied notwithstanding the fact that they left no choice to the appellants in selecting the person who was to supply the tiles. If that is right then the respondents must succeed. The loss was not caused by Somerset 13 tiles being unsuitable for the contract purpose: it was caused by the tiles which were supplied being of defective quality.

There is not very much authority on this matter, so it may be well first to consider it as a question of principle. In my view no warranty ought to be implied in a contract unless it is in all the circumstances reasonable. If authority A be required for that proposition I find it in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Readhead v. Midland Ry. Co. (1):

“Warranties implied by law are for the most part founded on the presumed B intention of the parties and ought certainly to be founded on reason and with a just regard to the interests of the party who is supposed to give the warranty, as well as of the party to whom it is supposed to be given.”

I take first the general question of the contractor's liability where the material C which he is required to use can be obtained from any one of several suppliers and the choice of suppliers is left to him. There is no doubt that in every case he is bound to make a proper inspection of the material before using it, and he will be liable if the loss is caused by the use of material which reasonable inspection would have shown to be defective. The question is whether he warrants the material against latent defects.

There are in my view good reasons for implying such a warranty, if it is not excluded by the terms of the contract. If the contractor's employer suffers loss by reason of the emergence of the latent defect, he will generally have no redress if he cannot recover damages from the contractor. If, however, he can recover D damages the contractor will generally not have to bear the loss: he will have bought the defective material from a seller who will be liable under s. 14 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, because the material was not of merchantable quality; and if that seller had in turn bought from someone else there will again be liability, so that there will be a chain of liability from the employer who suffers the damage back to the author of the defect. Of course the chain may be E broken because the contractor (or an earlier buyer) may have agreed to enter into a contract under which his supplier excluded or limited his ordinary liability under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893; but in general that has nothing to do with the employer and should not deprive him of his remedy. If the contractor chooses to buy on such terms, he takes the risk of having to bear the loss himself if the goods prove to be defective.

Moreover many contracts for work and materials closely resemble contracts F of sale: where the employer contracts for the supply and installation of a machine or other article, the supply of the machine may be the main element and the work of installation be a comparatively small matter. If the employer had bought the article and installed it himself, he would have had a warranty under s. 14 (2) and it would be strange that the fact that the seller also agreed to install it should make all the difference. G

The speciality in the present case is that these tiles were only made by one manufacturer. So the contractor had to buy them from him or from someone who bought from him. Why should that make any difference? It would make a difference if that manufacturer was only willing to sell on terms which excluded or limited his ordinary liability under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and that fact was known to the employer and the contractor when they made their H contract. For it would be unreasonable to put on the contractor a liability for latent defects when the employer had chosen the supplier with knowledge that the contractor could not have recourse against him. If the manufacturer's disclaimer of liability caused him to supply the goods at a cheaper price, as in theory at least it should, the employer ought not to get the benefit of a cheap price as well as a warranty from the contractor. A more difficult case would be I where the employer and contractor had no reason to suppose, when they made their contract, that the manufacturer would refuse to sell subject to a seller's ordinary liabilities in respect of the goods which he sells. I need not consider that case now, however, because there is no suggestion that Browne's had refused to sell except on terms which limited their ordinary liability in respect of latent defects in their tiles. No doubt there will be some cases where, although the

A contractor had a right of recourse against the manufacturer, he cannot in fact operate that right. The supplier may have become insolvent, or, as in the present case, the action against the contractor may be so delayed that he has no time left in which to sue his supplier. But these cases must be relatively few, and it would seem better that the contractor should occasionally have to suffer than that the employer should very seldom have any remedy at all. It therefore seems to me that general principles point strongly to there being an implied warranty of quality in this case.

B There is little assistance to be got from the earlier authorities. The first which must be examined is G. H. Myers & Co. v. Brent Cross Service Co. (2). There Myers engaged Brent Cross to repair their motor car. It was necessary to fit new connecting rods and Brent Cross obtained them from the makers of the car. One C had a latent defect so that when the car was used again it broke and caused extensive damage. After reviewing the authorities DU PARCQ, J., said (3):

"... I think that the true view is that a person contracting to do work and supply materials warrants that the materials which he uses will be of good quality and reasonably fit for the purpose for which he is using them, unless the circumstances of the contract are such as to exclude any such warranty."

D The only addition which I would make is that there are really two warranties, one as to quality and one as to reasonable fitness for the job, and the fact that the latter is excluded, as it is in this case, does not affect the warranty of quality. But I do not think that the example which follows that statement of principle is happily chosen. Whatever may have been the case in 1933, today cases must E be rare where the car owner can reasonably suppose that spare parts can be obtained from any other source than the makers of the car; and it may well be that the owner ought at least to suspect that the makers will refuse to supply spare parts without limiting their liability for damage caused by latent defects. So it may well be that this is a case where the circumstances do exclude any F warranty by the garage of the quality of the spare parts fitted in repairing the car. It appears to me that less cogent circumstances may be sufficient to exclude an implied warranty of quality where the use of spare parts is only incidental to what is in essence a repairing operation where the customer's main reliance is on the skill of the tradesman, than in a case where the main element is the supply of an article, the installation being merely incidental.

G I have had in mind in formulating my opinion the circumstances in Gloucestershire County Council v. Richardson (4) and the arguments addressed to your lordships in that case. I do not think it necessary to examine in detail any of the other authorities which have been cited. In the present case one must sympathise with the appellants because, through no fault of their own, they have lost their right of ultimate recourse against the makers of these tiles. But, putting that aside because the existence or non-existence of the warranty must be determined as at H the date of the contract, this appears to me to be a clear case in which a warranty of quality must be implied. I would, therefore, dismiss this appeal.

I LORD PEARCE: My Lords, the Somerset 13 tiles supplied by the third party in pursuance of their contract to supply and fix Somerset 13 tiles were admittedly defective in quality. The defect was latent and the failure to detect it does not reflect on the skill or care of the tilers. Unless, therefore, they were responsible for the merchantability or the proper quality of the tiles, they are not liable.

Had this been a sale of tiles, the third party would have been liable for breach of condition as to merchantability under s. 14 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and could in turn (in the normal course) have recovered from those who had sold to them. They would not, however, have been liable under the more searching condition of fitness for the purpose which is implied by s. 14 (1), since the employers chose and ordered the tiles under their trade name of Somerset 13. A

It is argued, however, that there is a clear distinction between a sale of goods and a contract for work done and materials supplied and that, either no responsibility for the materials arises under the latter form of contract or, all responsibility is excluded when materials of a particular sort, for which there is only one manufacturer, are chosen by the employer. Where the defect in materials is patent, the problem does not arise; for in such a case the obligation to use skill and care would be broken by the use of materials which had patent faults, and the employer could recover on that ground. But where the fault is latent, the point is not covered by the duty to use care and skill, since care and skill could not have prevented the trouble. B

If the appellants' argument is correct, an employer has no redress for loss arising out of the use of material with latent defects if he has ordered a particular kind of material, for it was not the employer but the contractor who bought from the manufacturer. The employer therefore cannot sue the manufacturer unless it is possible to extend Donaghue v. Stevenson (5) further than it has gone up to the present. C

I see great difficulty in extending to an ultimate consumer a right to sue the manufacturer in tort in respect of goods which create no peril or accident but simply result in sub-standard work under a contract which is unknown to the original manufacturer, and if originally, as a term of his contract, the manufacturer limited his liability for defects, there seems no reason (where there is no peril or accident) why a third party should have better rights than the original purchaser; and if his rights are the same, there is no need to introduce a rule which would cause various confusions and difficulties since the same result can be achieved in the normal case by third party procedure. If, however, the employer can sue the contractor in respect of the faulty materials, then the contractor can in turn recover from the manufacturer with whom the ultimate blame lies. This would follow the normal chain of liability which attaches to sales and sub-sales of goods. D

The question here is whether goods sold drop out of the normal chain of liability as soon as they become goods supplied pursuant to a contract under which their supply is accompanied by a large or small proportion of labour done. The tiles start their economic journey (from the manufacturer to their ultimate destination) as goods sold in the normal course since the manufacturer sells them to the contractor. When the contractor in turn "supplies" the tiles to the employer under a contract for work done and materials supplied, he normally adds a reasonable profit to the price which he has paid to the manufacturer. Had he re-sold them to the employer he would have been responsible to the employer for their merchantability. Does the fact that he has "supplied" them (at a price which may or may not be separately itemised in the bill) make so great a difference that it exempts him from all liability for their merchantability? On broad principle there seems no adequate reason why this should be so. Nor does the general commercial benefit of the community seem to favour it. E

The cases which preceded and crystallised in the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, do not, as far as conditions or warranties are concerned, seem to show any clear consciousness of a difference in principle between a sale of goods and a contract for labour and materials. (See e.g., Francis v. Cockrell (6); Randall v. Newsom (7) and Jones v. Just (8).) F

It is frequent for builders to fit baths, sanitary equipment, central heating and the like, encouraging their clients to choose from the wholesalers' display rooms G

A the bath or sanitary fitting which they prefer. It would, I think, surprise the average householder if it were suggested that simply by exercising a choice he had lost all right of recourse in respect of the quality of the fittings against the builder who normally has a better knowledge of these matters. Of course if a builder warned him against a particular fitting or manufacturer and he persisted in his choice, he would obviously be doing so at his own risk; and a builder can always make it clear that he is not prepared to take responsibility for a particular kind of fitting or material. The general rule, however, is that laid down by DU PARCQ, J., in Myers v. Brent Cross Service Co. (9) that

B “... a person contracting to do work and supply materials warrants that the materials which he uses will be of good quality and reasonably fit for the purpose for which he is using them, unless the circumstances of the contract are such as to exclude any such warranty.”

C I do not, however, accept the instance which he gave of circumstances which would exclude a warranty. If it is known to both parties that the manufacturer gives no warranty to the contractor, that fact is a strong indication that no warranty is being given by the contractor. So, too, if a contractor advises against a particular material; but the circumstances of contracts are so various that it must be a question of fact and degree whether the circumstances of a particular case suffice to exclude a warranty which the general rule implies.

D In the present case the employer's choice of Somerset 13 tiles, which were manufactured by only one firm, is not in itself sufficient to exclude the warranty of quality. It is an unfortunate coincidence for the tilers that the statute of limitation prevented their recourse to the manufacturers; but that fact cannot alter their liability which in normal and less unfortunate circumstances would be handed on to the manufacturer.

E I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

LORD UPJOHN: My Lords, the sole though important question in this appeal is as to the extent of the implied warranty (if any) imposed by law on a contractor who agrees to do work and supply materials. The appellants, experienced in supplying and laying roofing materials, were employed by the respondents on a contract admittedly for work and materials to supply and lay Somerset No. 13 red tiles to the roofs of certain houses being built on an estate at Gerrards Cross. Did they thereby impliedly make any warranty that the tiles supplied by them were (a) of good quality and (b) reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were supplied?

G Had the contract been one for sale of goods then it is not in dispute that s. 14 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, would have applied and entitled the respondents to succeed in their claim for breach of warranty that the tiles were of good quality, for it was common ground that, though Somerset No. 13 tiles are in general a high grade tile of good quality fit for the purpose for which they were supplied, this particular batch were deficient, though the deficiency was latent and not discernible on reasonable examination by a person of skill and experience, as was agreed before the learned official referee.

H Your lordships were properly referred to authorities in the nineteenth century, for s. 14 (2) only put the common law as it had been established into a statutory code. The departure of the common law in relation to sale of goods from the old principle of “caveat emptor” (which still applies fundamentally to sale of real estate) was recognised as long ago as 1815 by LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., in Gardiner v. Gray (10). He stated the principle (11) that where there was a sale by description the purchaser has a right to expect a saleable article answering to the description in the contract and that is an implied term in every such contract. Where there was no opportunity to inspect, the principle of caveat emptor did not apply. Your lordships need not consider any question of an opportunity to inspect, because, as PARK, J., in effect recognised much later in Jones v. Bright (12), in the case of latent defects (with which alone your lordships are concerned) there cannot be an opportunity to inspect. There are many later cases developing LORD ELLENBOROUGH's principle (13) until we find BEST, C.J., in Jones v. Bright (14) saying: "If a man sells an article he thereby warrants it is merchantable." Curiously enough, however, there is no equal body of decision at common law in the nineteenth century to support, in express terms, a similar implied warranty in the case of contracts for work and materials. But that a man who supplies his labour or his labour and materials is subject to the same basic obligation cannot be doubted. In Duncan v. Blundell (15), BAYLEY, J., in his usual direct language said of a case where the defendant had undertaken to supply and fit a stove (16):

"Where a person is employed in a work of skill, the employer buys both his labour and his judgment; he ought not to undertake the work if it cannot succeed, and he should know whether it will or not; of course it is otherwise if the party employing him choose to supersede the workman's judgment by using his own."

The distinction between a contract for the sale of goods and a contract for the provision of work and materials is one which depends on the particular nature of each individual contract, as CROMPTON, J., said as long ago as 1861 in Lee v. Griffin (17), and it is frequently a question of fine distinction. It would be most unsatisfactory, illogical, and indeed a severe blow to any idea of a coherent system of common law, if the existence of an implied obligation depended on such a distinction. That there are distinctions between the two types of contracts is undoubted; questions of pleading (in the old days), passing of property, and so on. The real distinction however, on which so many decisions were focussed depended on the fact that for 277 years until 1954 a contract of sale above a small value required evidence in writing to be enforceable whereas a contract for work and materials did not. In such cases the question whether any terms should be implied in the case of the one type of contract rather than the other seldom arose. The exception, however, did arise in Samuels v. Davis (18) where a dentist sued for a denture which he had made and supplied, for which his patient refused to pay because it did not fit his gums. The county court judge held that the denture was not reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was supplied. In the leading case of Lee v. Griffin (19) it had been held that such a contract was one of sale. As DU PARCQ, L.J., said in Samuels v. Davis (20):

"... in Lee v. Griffin (19) the court was not directing its attention to the question whether there were any incidents in the case of a contract for the sale of a denture which were different from those in the case of a contract for the work and labour expended on the making of a denture. I have no doubt that, if the question had arisen for decision, whether it made any difference whether the contract was described as one of sale or one of work and labour, the answer for the present purpose would have been: 'None whatever'."

In the same case, delivering the first judgment of the Court of Appeal, SCOTT, L.J., had said (21) that it was a matter of legal indifference whether the contract was one for the supply of goods, or one of service to do work and supply materials.

So I cannot see any logical distinction between the obligations which ought in general to be implied with regard to quality and fitness between a sale of goods

A and a contract for work and materials. Indeed, for my part I think that, as a matter of common sense and justice, one who contracts to do work and supply materials ought to be under at least as high if not a higher degree of obligation with regard to the goods he supplies and the work that he does than a seller who may be a mere middleman or wholesaler. GREER, L.J., took this view in the Court of Appeal in Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd. v. Manganese Bronze and Brass Co., Ltd. (22).

B It is not in doubt that at common law (Randall v. Newsom (23)) and now under s. 14 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, a vendor is under an implied obligation to warrant to his purchaser the quality of his goods against latent as well as patent defects. It was argued that at all events the contractor of labour and materials should be under no such obligation in relation to latent defects. For the reasons already given I am unable to accept this argument (unsupported as it is by any authority) which is, in my opinion, untenable in principle.

C My lords, I think that the true view is that stated by DU PARCQ, J., in G. H. Myers & Co. v. Brent Cross Service Co. (24):

D " . . . the true view is that a person contracting to do work and supply materials warrants that the materials which he uses will be of good quality and reasonably fit for the purpose for which he is using them, unless the circumstances of the contract are such as to exclude any such warranty."

That statement, I have no doubt, involves two warranties though, as in this case, it very frequently happens that for any relevant purpose there is no difference between the two.

E Judged by this test the appellants were instructed to supply a particular type of tile which inherently was of high grade quality and well fitted for its purpose and so the implied warranty would apply unless the circumstances were sufficient to exclude it. In my opinion, the fact that the appellants were instructed to supply in terms a Somerset No. 13 red tile is not sufficient to exclude such implied warranty, which must be judged as at the time of the contract. This is not a case analogous to those cases where the employer may have ordered the contractor to supply certain particular goods which are found to be inherently unsuitable for the purpose. Such cases may give rise to many difficult factual and legal problems. The truth is that the appellants through no fault of their own had the misfortune to supply a particular batch of tiles which failed to conform to the proper standard of quality and fitness. I can see no reason why they should be absolved from their implied obligations.

G Unfortunately having correctly stated, as I think, the proper principles, DU PARCQ, J., gave an illustration (25): "Repair my car; get the parts from the makers of the car and fit them" as being sufficient to exclude the implied warranty. In common with, I believe, all of your lordships and of the members of the Court of Appeal (26), I regard this as an inaccurate illustration of the principle which the learned judge had so lucidly and correctly just stated; but for this illustration I do not doubt that the official referee would have reached a different and correct conclusion.

H Under our principles of jurisprudence, apart from a so far scarcely charted sea of the law of torts in this area, the practical business effect and just solution to this type of breach of contract is that each vendor or contractor of labour and materials should warrant his supply of materials against patent and latent defects so that by the well-known chain of third party procedures the ultimate culprit, the manufacturer, may be made liable for his defective manufacture. For reasons which your lordships need not discuss that chain was broken in this case.

My lords, had this been a sale of goods, s. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, A would not have applied; first, because the contractors were ordered to supply the tiles by their trade name and, secondly, because on the facts of this case there was clearly no reliance on the contractors' skill or judgment; but DU PARCQ, J., in his statement of the law (27) rightly, as I think, imposed a higher obligation on the contractor who supplies work and materials. But such obligations are, however, conditioned by the proviso that the circumstances of the B contract may be such as to exclude them. I have already expressed my opinion that there are no such circumstances in this case but it is a matter of crucial importance in the appeal which your lordships are about to consider.

For these reasons I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD WILBERFORCE: My Lords, the question is whether, under a C contract to supply and fix roofing tiles described under a brand name (Somerset 13), the suppliers, the appellants, are liable for damages in respect of latent defects which, in effect, made the tiles useless. The particular brand of tiles was selected by the respondents (more exactly by a Mr. Saunders who was accepted on the pleadings their have been acting as their agent) and was a brand only manufactured by one particular company.

The Court of Appeal (28) approached the case on the basis that the contract D was one for "work and materials" and considered the question for decision to be whether, in such a contract, a condition or warranty should be implied similar to that which arises in relation to a sale of goods under s. 14 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. Since Mr. Saunders was himself a builder of experience comparable with that of the appellants' representative, no question could arise E of reliance on the skill and judgment of the latter, so as to attract the provisions of s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1893.

The expression "a contract for work and materials", engraved on the lips of every legal practitioner, is one of considerable imprecision. It had its usefulness when it was necessary to devise an explanation why certain contracts should be exempted from the requirements as to sales or agreements for sale of the Statute of Frauds, 1677 and later, the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, of embodiment in writing: F it has its relevance in connexion with the technicalities of pleading (see Atkinson v. Bell (29)); but in the present context, of an inquiry whether there should be implied any condition, or warranty, as to fitness or quality, the expression is not of great assistance, because the contracts which may plausibly be covered by it are of too great a diversity. On the one hand there is a wide range or spectrum G of cases between, at one extreme, those where the predominant interest of the "purchaser" is in the production of a result, the contribution of the materials being subsidiary and left to the judgment of the "seller" and those where the main element lies in the materials, the work being of a subsidiary character. Such contracts as for the colouring of hair, for the supply of a denture, for the printing of a book, for a mink cape, may lie at different points along the scale, and as regards H any materials involved in the contract, different warranties may and indeed must be appropriate. On the other hand, the expression may be used to convey a difference between a contract for the sale of an article, and a contract for the supply and fixing of an article: there will be "price" in one case, "consideration" in the other and the property may pass at different times. Yet this difference would seem to have little relevance to any question of condition or warranty. I Why should the obligation of a supplier of a bath, or any other article needing to be installed, be different according to whether he does or does not also undertake to instal it?

Authority apart, it would seem reasonable that, the larger the element of supply of particular goods in the contract, the closer should be the similarity

A of warranties to be implied with those arising on a sale. In many cases there would be no logical reason for not importing a condition or warranty identical with that arising under s. 14 (2), or possibly under s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1893. On the other hand, if the acquisition of an identifiable object is of minimal, or no interest to the "purchaser" then, if any warranty is to be implied, it should properly relate either to the quality of the work to be done or to the use of suitable, and non-injurious, materials.

B I do not think that much citation of authority is required to show that, in fact, the law has developed in just this way. Before the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, the courts had to consider questions of implied warranty under the common law and they did so, both in relation to sales, proprio sensu, and to analogous contracts, not strictly or at least not purely sales, in precisely the same way. Their conclusions as to sales were taken into the Act of 1893, but the pre-existing principles remained and continued to be applied. For an illustrative pre-1893 decision I take Randall v. Newsom (30). The order was for a pole and splinter-bar to be made and fitted to the plaintiffs' phaeton carriage and it was claimed that the pole so made and fitted was of (latently) defective wood. The court, following in this respect the well-known decision in Jones v. Bright (31), in which the common law rules as to "merchantability" and "particular purpose" were laid down very much in the form which they have since continued to bear, held the plaintiff entitled to recover. The generality of the supplier's obligation cannot be better stated than in the words of BRETT, J.A., delivering the judgment of the court (32):

E "I have cited these cases, and the principles laid down in them, in order clearly to ascertain what is the primary or ultimate rule from which the rules which have been applied to contracts of purchase and sale of somewhat different kinds have been deduced. Those different rules, as applied to such different contracts, are carefully enumerated and recognised in Jones v. Just (33). In some contracts the undertaking of the seller is said to be only that the article shall be merchantable; in others, that it shall be reasonably fit for the purpose to which it is to be applied. In all, it seems to us, it is either assumed or expressly stated, that the fundamental undertaking is, that the article offered or delivered shall answer the description of it contained in the contract. That rule comprises all the others; they are adaptations of it to particular kinds of contracts of purchase and sale. You must, therefore, first determine from the words used, or the circumstances, what, in or according to the contract, is the real mercantile or business description of the thing which is the subject-matter of the bargain of purchase or sale, or, in other words, the contract. If that subject-matter be merely the commercial article or commodity, the undertaking is, that the thing offered or delivered shall answer that description, that is to say, shall be that article or commodity, saleable or merchantable. If the subject-matter be an article or commodity to be used for a particular purpose, the thing offered or delivered must answer that description, that is to say, it must be that article or commodity, and reasonably fit for the particular purpose."

H Since the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, it has been fully accepted by the courts that suitable warranties, adapted to the nature of the contract, ought to be implied in contracts where there are mixed elements of supply of goods and work to be done. I do not think it necessary to enumerate those cases, some of which are inadequately reported, but confine myself to one illustration. In Samuels v. Davis (34) the Court of Appeal had to consider a contract for a denture—the same contract which before the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, had been the subject of the leading case of Lee v. Griffin (35). The court found an implied condition of reasonable fitness for the purpose without finding it necessary to decide the precise nature of the contract. SCOTT, L.J., said in Samuels v. Davis (36): A

"In my view it is a matter of legal indifference whether the contract was one for the supply of goods or one of service to do work and supply materials ..."

and DU PARCQ, L.J., agreed. B

The principle of this, and of other cases, was in fact stated in G. H. Myers & Co. v. Brent Cross Service Co. (37), where DU PARCQ, J., reviewed the authorities preceding the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and summed up the law in the following proposition (38):

"... the true view is that a person contracting to do work and supply materials warrants that the materials which he uses will be of good quality and reasonably fit for the purpose for which he is using them, unless the circumstances of the contract are such as to exclude any such warranty." C

The learned judge, later in the same passage, gives some illustrations with which one may not wholly agree, and the distinction is perhaps somewhat blurred between warranties as to fitness for a purpose and warranties of quality and the separate ways in which they may be excluded, but as a concise statement of the law I find the passage acceptable so long as it is understood (as I think it has been) as requiring consideration to be given to the nature of each contract in order to see what prominence is given in it to the respective elements of "goods" and "work", and to see whether and to what degree the element of reliance on the supplier's skill and judgment is present or absent. D

In the present case, the contract was in the composite form "supply and fix" so that it was not strictly a contract of sale. It was indeed contended by the respondents that the appellants are bound by an admission in the pleadings that the contract was one of sale. I regard this point as of no importance since neither analysis nor authority supports the suggestion that, other circumstances apart, the conditions or warranties to be implied should be any different from those which would have arisen had this contract been for sale simpliciter. A significant circumstance undoubtedly is that the "purchaser" selected the type of goods to be supplied and, by implication, since only one firm made them, nominated the sub-supplier. By this, he took on himself the responsibility of selecting tiles suitable for his purpose, and so negatived any implied warranty from his supplier that the goods were suitable for that purpose; but I cannot attribute any further effect to the nomination. The supplier was a person dealing in goods of the description ordered, because in the ordinary course of his business he would accept orders, as previously he had for "Redland 40" and as in substitution he did, without demur, for "Somerset 13". He thus assumed responsibility for delivering goods "of merchantable quality". That means, in this context, goods of the minimum quality to be expected of goods of the description. Is there any reason why this warranty should not be implied against him? To impose on him liability for latent defects makes him, so far, an insurer in respect of the defects which he could not prevent and of which he did not know; but it is well settled that the implied condition as to fitness extends to latent defects (Randall v. Newsom (39)). That this should be so in the case of the manufacturer needs no justification: and where the supplier is a dealer, such as a wholesaler, or retailer, the justification for imposing liability on him is that it is open to him, and is consequently his responsibility, to obtain a similar warranty from his own supplier so that ultimately responsibility can be traced back to where it should lie, i.e., with the manufacturer, or whoever else has brought the defect about. It is an unfortunate feature of the present case that by lapse of time the normal right of recourse is E

A denied to the supplier but this cannot affect the contractual position between him and the person to whom he supplied the goods.

I find, therefore, every reason why the warranty should apply and no reason why it should not, and consequently the appellants were correctly held liable to the respondents for the defective tiles. The appeal must be dismissed.

Building—Contract—Sub-contractors—Nominated suppliers—Alleged wrongful repudiation by building contractor—Defective materials supplied—Undetectable defect—Whether main contractor warrants impliedly the fitness of materials supplied by nominated supplier—Building contract—Architect—Instructions—Notice to determine contract on ground of delay exceeding one month—Notice given by contractor—Whether contractor in breach of contract or whether notice valid—R.I.B.A. form of contract, conditions, cl. 18 (v), cl. 20.

E A contractor contracted with employers to erect an extension to a technical college. The agreement incorporated the R.I.B.A. form* of contract. The tender allowed a prime cost of £7,000 for concrete columns to be supplied by nominated suppliers. In accepting the contractor's tender the employers nominated, by their architect, suppliers (not those named in the tender) at a price of about £4,941. The authorised quotation of the suppliers, which the contractor was thus bound to accept, included a term limiting liability for defective goods and excluding liability for consequential loss or damage.

G The columns had defects which were undetectable when they were supplied, but which appeared after some columns had been used in the construction. Because of this the constructing engineer on behalf of the architect orally instructed the contractor on or before Aug. 21, 1961, to stop all work connected with the columns. On Aug. 21 the contractor wrote to the architect, who replied on Aug. 23, the terms of this correspondence constituting (as held by the Court of Appeal and the majority of the House of Lords) architect's instructions for the purposes of cl. 18 (v) of the conditions of the building contract. The contractor completed all work other than that which he had been told to stop. No instructions were issued to him to re-start work. His solicitors, by letters dated Oct. 23 and Nov. 6, gave notice of the determination of the contract on the ground, which cl. 20† taken with cl. 18† of the conditions of the building contract provided, that the whole or substantially the whole of the work had been delayed for more than one month by reason of causes mentioned in cl. 18, viz., by reason of architect's instructions. Clause 21 of the conditions of the building contract dealt with nominated sub-contractors, and provided that no nominated sub-contractor should be employed against whom the contractor made reasonable objection or who would not contract to indemnify the contractor; but cl. 22, which dealt with nominated suppliers, contained no such provision for the protection of the contractor. Clause 22 provided that all specialists who had been nominated to supply materials or goods were suppliers to the contractor. It was conceded in the course of the proceedings that the contractor would not be entitled to determine the building contract under cl. 18 (v) if the architect's instructions resulted from a breach of contract by the contractor.

Held: (i) (LORD PEARSON dissenting) in view of the terms of the building contract, in particular (LORD UPJOHN, however, not relying on this ground) the contrast between cl. 20 and cl. 21 of the conditions of the building contract, and in view of the circumstances that the design, materials, specification, quality and price of the concrete columns was fixed by the employers and the suppliers without reference to the contractor, and in view of the restriction of the extent of the remedy against the suppliers contained in the contract with them that the contractor was obliged to accept, any warranty by the contractor of the quality or fitness of the columns supplied by the suppliers was excluded (see p. 1184, letter H, p. 1185, letter H, p. 1186, letter D, p. 1189, letter G, p. 1190, letters G and I, p. 1192, letter H, and p. 1193, letter D, post); accordingly the contractor's concession made in the course of the action did not exclude him from relying on cl. 20 and cl. 18 (v) of the conditions of the building contract.

(ii) (LORD PEARSON not deciding on this) on the facts there had been architect's instructions for the purposes of cl. 18 (v) of the conditions of the building contract, which instructions caused the delay within cl. 20 notwithstanding that the root cause was discovery of the defect in the columns, and the contractor was entitled, therefore, to give notice to determine the contract (see p. 1184, letter H, p. 1187, letters C and E, p. 1188, letter G, and p. 1191, letter D, post).

Appeal.

This was an appeal by the appellants, Gloucestershire County Council ("the employers") against the judgment, dated June 23, 1967, of the Court of Appeal (SELLERS, DAVIES and RUSSELL, L.J.J.) and reported [1967] 3 All E.R. 458, allowing the appeal of the respondent, Henry William Richardson (trading as W. J. Richardson & Son), a building contractor, from the judgment dated July 28, 1966, of His Honour NORMAN RICHARDS, Q.C., an official referee, holding the contractor liable in damages to the employers under a building contract in the standard R.I.B.A. form (1939 Edn., 1957 revision) dated Nov. 21, 1960, for the

A building of extensions to the Stroud and District Technical College at Stroud, Gloucestershire. The architect under the contract was the employers' county architect, and the employers appointed a firm of consulting engineers, Hajnal & Myers, on the recommendation of the architect. The method of construction provided by the contract required the use of pre-cast pre-stressed concrete columns as the main bearing members of the building.

B The contract included the following relevant clauses among its annexed conditions—

“1. The contractor shall carry out and complete the works in accordance with this contract in every respect in accordance with the directions and to the reasonable satisfaction of the architect... the architect may... from time to time issue... written instructions, ... (all of which are in these conditions collectively referred to as ‘architect’s instructions’) in regard to: (a) the variation or modification of the design... of the works or... omission or substitution of any work... (e) the postponement of any work to be executed under the provisions of this contract...”

“If any verbal instructions... involving a variation are given to the contractor or his foreman on the works by the architect or by the clerk of works appointed by [the employers], such instructions... shall be confirmed in writing by the contractor to the architect within seven days, and if not dissented from in writing by the architect to the contractor within a further seven days shall be deemed to be architect’s instructions. The contractor shall forthwith comply with all architect’s instructions...”

E If compliance with architect’s instructions involves the contractor in loss or expense beyond that provided for in or reasonably contemplated by this contract, then, unless such instructions were issued by reason of some breach of contract by the contractor, the amount of such loss or expense shall be... added to the contract sum.

“18. If in the opinion of the architect the works be delayed... (v) by reason of architect’s instructions given in pursuance of cl. 1 of these conditions or (vi) because the contractor has not received in due time necessary instructions from the architect for which he shall have specifically applied in writing, ... then in any such case the architect shall make a fair and reasonable extension of time for completion of the works...”

G “20. ... if the whole or substantially the whole of the works... is delayed for [one month] by one or more of the causes... which are named in cl. 18 of these conditions, the contractor may, without prejudice to any other rights or remedies thereupon by notice by registered post to [the employers] or architect determine the employment of the contractor under this contract.

H “21. Where prime cost... sums are included in the bills of quantities for persons to be nominated or selected by the architect to supply and fix materials or to execute work on the site, (a) ... all specialists... who have been nominated or selected by the architect are hereby declared to be sub-contractors employed by the contractor and are referred to in these conditions as ‘nominated sub-contractors’. Provided that no nominated sub-contractor shall be employed... in connexion with the works against whom the contractor shall make reasonable objection or... who will not enter into a sub-contract providing—(i) that the nominated sub-contractor shall indemnify the contractor against the same obligations in respect of the sub-contract as those for which the contractor is liable in respect of this contract; (ii) that the nominated sub-contractor should indemnify the contractor against claims in respect of any negligence by such sub-contractor...”

I “22. Where prime cost... sums are included in the bills of quantities in respect of any materials or goods to be fixed by the contractor, (a) ...

[this para. (a) contained no proviso corresponding to that in cl. 21 (a) against nominated sub-contractors being employed who would not provide for indemnity] . . . (b) all specialists . . . who have been nominated or selected by the architect to supply such materials or goods are hereby declared to be suppliers to the contractors and are referred to in these conditions as 'nominated suppliers'. All payments by the contractor for such materials or goods shall be in full and shall be paid within thirty days of the end of the month during which delivery is made less only a cash discount . . . if so paid . . ."

The bills of quantities provided a sum of £7,000 for pre-cast pre-stressed concrete columns to be supplied by a nominated supplier and delivered to the site, and allowed profit to be added of 2½ per cent. (£175). The bills of quantities further provided that these materials should be fixed by the contractor. By letter to the contractor dated Sept. 21, 1960, the architect nominated Cawood Wharton & Co., Ltd. (hereinafter called "Cawoods") as suppliers of concrete units and enclosed a copy of Cawoods' price quotation dated July 25, 1960, and authorised and requested the contractor to accept it and place his order with Cawoods. The contractor accepted it by letter dated Sept. 27, 1960. The quotation given by Cawoods was subject to their standard conditions which included restriction on their liability in respect of defects in goods supplied by them and by their letter of Oct. 5, 1960, Cawoods informed the contractor that his order was accepted subject to their standard conditions of sale. Concrete columns were delivered by Cawoods and were inspected on delivery by representatives of the consulting engineers, by the clerk of the works, and by the employers' divisional architect. No defects were discovered. The columns were erected between March and June, 1961. No defects were apparent. In July, 1961, cracks were seen in some of the columns and in August, 1961, the clerk of the works was instructed by the consulting engineers to tell the contractor to stop all work on the perimeter columns. By letter dated Sept. 23, 1961, to the architect's department of the employers, the contractor notified them that all his men had ceased to work and that they awaited instructions as to recommencing work. By letters dated Oct. 23 and Nov. 6 and 8, 1961, of the contractor's solicitors to the employers the contractor gave formal notice to determine the building contract on the ground of delay exceeding one month, citing cl. 18 (i), (v) and (vii) of the building contract. The employers brought an action against the contractor claiming damages for wrongful determination of the building contract. The question for decision on the appeal was whether the contractor was entitled to give notice of determination. The root cause of the delay was the defect in the concrete columns. Certain relevant matters in regard to the tender for the building contract are set out in the opinion of LORD WILBERFORCE at p. 1192, letters B to F, post.

D. A. Grant, Q.C., and David Kemp for the employers.
Donald Keating and P. N. Garland for the contractor.

LORD REID: My Lords, I agree with the majority of your lordships that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD PEARCE: My Lords, the contractor in any particular field of business, when he engages to do certain work and supply materials, impliedly warrants that the materials will be of good quality, unless the particular circumstances of the case show that the parties intended otherwise. To find the intention one must consider the express terms of the contract and any admissible surrounding circumstances.

Here the parties entered into a Royal Institute of British Architects contract, a complicated and sophisticated document. There is no express acceptance by either party of liability for the quality of the nominated materials. The contractor must comply with the instructions of the architect. He must accept

- A the architect's nomination in respect of certain sub-contractors and nominated suppliers. No nominated sub-contractor, however, can be employed (cl. 21) if the contractor makes reasonable objection to him or if, inter alia, the sub-contractor will not enter into a sub-contract indemnifying the contractor against claims for negligence of the sub-contractor and "against the same obligations in respect of the sub-contract as those for which the contractor is liable in respect of this contract". These words seem to make it clear that the contractor is accepting liability in respect of work done by the nominated sub-contractor.

The situation with regard to nominated suppliers, however, is noticeably different. The clause (22) which deals with nominated suppliers follows directly on that which deals with nominated sub-contractors. It provides no veto on the ground of the contractor's reasonable objection, nor on the ground of the nominated supplier refusing to indemnify the contractor. This omission cannot, I think, be unintentional. It seems, in contrast to cl. 21, to point to an intention that the contractor is not undertaking liability for materials provided by a nominated supplier: otherwise he must surely have been given, in the case of a nominated sub-contractor, an opportunity of making reasonable objections, and a right to insist on an indemnity from the supplier.

- D It would not be unreasonable for the parties to intend that an employer should take the responsibility for materials provided by nominated suppliers. They have been selected, without giving the contractor any right to express views, by the employer's own expert architect, who has decided that the nominated goods are suitable for the purpose and who has made the preliminary arrangements with the suppliers either before or during the main contract.
- E The contractor is simply instructed to obtain his supplies from the nominated supplier. It is the employer who, through his architect, alone arranges the price, which is liable to be reflected in the quality and who alone can insist on tests and checks of quality. All the circumstances of the nomination appear actually to exclude any reliance on the contractor's skill and judgment; and though the contractor receives a profit on the nominated supply, it is a controlled profit and he has certain duties to perform such as co-ordinating the delivery with the work and doing his best to see that there are no delays (see cl. 18 (vii)).

- F On the other hand, if the contractor is not liable for materials provided by nominated suppliers, the employer is left without a remedy for faulty materials; for the contract, by cl. 22 indicates clearly that the nominated supplier is in contractual relation with the contractor only and, although the employer is paying for the nominated materials, he pays the contractor for them and the contractor pays the nominated supplier. Thus to hold that the contractor is not liable for nominated supplies is to go against one of the important reasons for the general rule that there is a warranty of good quality in materials supplied under a contract for labour and materials, namely that the employer should have a remedy against the contractor who can in turn enforce it against the supplier
- G with whom the fault lies.

- H Yet in spite of this important fact I think that the contrast between the wording of c. 21 and that of cl. 22 persuades one to the view that the contract shows an intention to exclude a warranty by the contractor in respect of nominated supplies. And the particular circumstances of the case fortify this view. The employers (or their architect) employed a skilled engineer to advise in respect of the columns in question. The engineer, without any consultation with the contractor, prepared detailed designs of the columns, chose out Cawood Wharton & Co., Ltd. ("Cawoods") as suitable suppliers, and gave them such instructions as he considered were necessary to specify the composition of the columns. The architects obtained a quotation from Cawoods which was lower than the amount quoted by another firm and also substantially lower than the prime cost item, and which contained a substantial limitation of the purchaser's right of recourse in the event of the columns being defective. The architect presumably was satisfied with this and, without discussing the matter with the contractor, instructed him to accept the quotation. A

The employers, through their architect, having directed the contractor to buy from a manufacturer who had substantially limited his own liability, it would not be reasonable to suppose that the parties were intending the contractor to accept an unlimited liability, which might have been very great, for these columns over whose manufacture he had no control whatsoever. It is suggested in argument by the appellants that one should assume some implied intention that there will be liability on the contractor limited to the curtailed right of recourse provided under Cawoods' quotation. If so, one would have to imply in respect of each nominated supplier that there is a liability limited to the right of recourse provided in each particular sub-contract of supply; but I see no ground for such a complicated implication which, if it existed, must surely have been embodied in express terms in cl. 22. In my opinion, the limitation of recourse against the nominated supplier and the other particular circumstances in respect of the supply of the columns provide confirmation of the intention indicated by the contract itself, namely, that any warranty by the contractor in respect of the quality of the nominated supplies was to be excluded. B C

The defect in the columns was not, therefore, a matter for which the contractor was liable or at fault. Consequently he can rely on cl. 18 (v) and claim that the works were delayed "by reason of the architect's instructions given in pursuance of cl. 1 of these conditions". D

I cannot, with respect, accept the finding of the learned official referee "that the cause for the suspension of the work and consequent delay was the discovery of the defects in the columns and not the result of any instruction given" or that "the continuance . . . of the delay was occasioned by the parties pursuing the agreed course". I think also that he placed too much weight on the contractor's admission that he would have suspended operations of his own volition. I naturally hesitate to differ from so careful and experienced an official referee; but I see the problem from a somewhat different angle, and that difference is a question of law turning on the meaning of the word "cause" and on the construction of the words (in cl. 20) "is delayed for the period named in the appendix to these conditions by one or more of the causes . . . which are named in cl. 18 of these conditions" and the words (in cl. 18) "If . . . the works be delayed . . . (v) by reason of architect's instructions . . ." E F

To construe the words one has to consider the framework of the two clauses. Clause 18 provides that in certain cases of delay "the architect shall make a fair and reasonable extension of time for completion of the works", so that the contractor shall not be unfairly penalised for not being able to complete his work within the contract time. There are eight kinds of delay which may give rise to a contractor's right to a fair extension: bad weather, a fire, delay of others, force majeure and so forth. The sub-cl. (v) with which we are dealing is concerned with delay by reason of the architect's instructions. This more often arises when the employer wants variations which make the contract more lengthy to perform, but it is equally applicable where, as here, the architect puts a "stop order" on the work. When the delays which would entitle a contractor to an extension of time exceed a certain period (in this case a month was stipulated) the contractor is entitled (under cl. 20) to determine the contract. G H

In order to ascertain whether the contractor was entitled to determine this contract under cl. 20, one has to ascertain whether "the whole or substantially the whole of the works" was delayed "for a month by one or more of the causes" which would have entitled the contractor to an extension of time. It follows that one is not trying to look under cl. 18 (v) for the real or ultimate cause of the delay which perhaps in this case one could say was faulty columns. In this context the words "by reason of architect's instructions" meant little more than "by obedience to architect's instructions". Otherwise a contractor might often be unfairly deprived of any extension under cl. 18 (v). Suppose owing to I

- A latent defects discovered in the subsoil during work, it is obvious that the foundations must be substantially strengthened and varied. The architect orders the necessary variations. The contractor has to carry them out. In one sense the work is not delayed by reason of the architect's instructions, since the ultimate cause of the delay was the faulty subsoil and the architect's instructions were the inevitable consequence. But this is not the sense which the contract intends.
- B Moreover, suppose that the builder agrees that the instructions were inevitable and adds that, even had there been no architect, he himself as a competent builder must have varied and strengthened the foundations. In such a case, in my opinion, the contractor would still have been entitled to an extension on the ground that the delay was by reason of instructions of the architect. The fact that (as here) some outside cause compelled the architect to give the instructions
- C is irrelevant. So, too, is the fact that (as here) the contractor agreed with the instructions and would have felt bound to act in a like sense on his own account. Otherwise it would seem that whenever the architect's variations were sensible and commanded the approval of the builder, he could never obtain an extension of time. This, in my opinion, was never intended by cl. 18; and cl. 18 is the key to the relief under cl. 20.
- D The contractor acquiesced in the stoppage ordered by the architect and indeed he could hardly have done otherwise. The architect and his assistants were in command of the situation. There is no evidence which could support an agreement between builder and architect which prevented the operation of cl. 18 (v) and cl. 20.

- E For these reasons I think that the delay caused by the instructions of the architect exceeded one month and entitled the contractor to serve notice of determination.

I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

- LORD UPJOHN: My Lords, on Sept. 21, 1960, the appellant council ("the employers") by letter accepted the fixed price tender by the respondent ("the contractor") to erect an extension to a technical college at Stroud for approximately £115,000. By the same letter the employers authorised the contractor to accept the tender already made to the employers by a specialist company Cawood Wharton & Co., Ltd. ("Cawoods") for forty pre-cast pre-stressed reinforced concrete columns whose function was to support the upper floors of the building. The contractor submitted an order to Cawoods, who accepted it on Oct. 5, 1960, on the terms of their standard conditions of sale.
- G The formal contract between the employer and the contractor was signed on Nov. 21, 1960, and was in the familiar R.I.B.A. contract form as specially adapted for the use of local authorities. It was faintly argued before your lordships, for the first time as I understood it, that, as the contract was not signed until Nov. 21, 1960, the contractor was a free agent to make terms with Cawoods when ordering the columns; but on the pleadings and having regard to the general course of the action before the learned official referee and on appeal I do not think that this point is open to the employers. It seems to me clear that from the date of the letter accepting the contractor's tender both parties proceeded on the footing that the contractor was not merely authorised but bound to accept Cawoods tender and on the terms of their standard conditions of sale.
- H
- I Work proceeded and the columns were duly delivered. Some of them were erected and then defects in the construction of these vitally important parts became apparent. On Aug. 21, 1961, a representative of the employers orally instructed the contractor to stop all work connected with the columns, a course which the contractor himself would have followed in any event. The contractor in writing acknowledged this instruction and this in turn was acknowledged by the architect. There was other work which the contractor could do, but this gradually came to an end. The architect gave no further instructions with regard to the defective columns. On Sept. 23 the contractor notified the architect that all his men had ceased work and that they awaited instructions as to re-commencing work. There were great delays, not due in any way to the contractor, in discovering the cause of the defects in the columns, and on Nov. 8, 1961, he gave notice to the employers terminating his employment under the contract. Ultimately, after the abandonment of the work, the defects were diagnosed as a failure by Cawoods to manufacture them in accordance with the specification.

My lords, in these circumstances two questions arise for decision:

(i) was the contractor entitled to give notice to terminate the contract under the provisions of the contract? This depends on the true construction of cl. 18 and cl. 20 of the conditions annexed to the contract, and

(ii) if so, was the contractor debarred from giving an effective notice because at law he can be held responsible for Cawoods' defective manufacture?—in other words, does the term normally implied in a contract for work and materials, as your lordships have just held in Young and Marten, Ltd. v. McManus Childs, Ltd. (1), apply or is it excluded having regard to the circumstances of the case? Rightly or wrongly it has been conceded throughout that if the contractor was in law responsible for Cawoods' defective work he could not rely on cl. 18 of the conditions.

On the first point, I must refer briefly to cl. 18 and cl. 20 of the conditions:

“ 18. If in the opinion of the architect the work be delayed . . .

“ (v) by reason of architect's instructions given in pursuance of cl. 1 of these conditions, or

“ (vi) because the contractor has not received in due time necessary instructions from the architect for which he shall have specifically applied in writing ” then the time for the execution of the works may be extended.

Then cl. 20 gave to the contractor the right to determine his employment under the contract if the whole or substantially the whole of the works were delayed for one month by one or more “ of the causes . . . which are named in cl. 18 of the conditions ”.

My lords, the learned official referee came to the conclusion that the correspondence of August, 1961, which I have briefly summarised, did not amount to “ architect's instructions ” for the purposes of cl. 18 (v). Every member of the Court of Appeal reached a contrary conclusion, and I agree with them. So subject to two points, which I must mention in a moment, I think it is clear that the contractor was entitled to give notice, after one month, to determine the contract.

I am also of opinion, though this matter was not decided in the Court of Appeal, that on the facts of this case the contractor did not receive instructions in “ due time ” under cl. 18 (vi) as to the recommencement of the work for which he had applied in writing. It is quite true that he was acquiescent in the delay but it was for the architect to make up his mind as to what was to be done and to give instructions accordingly. He cannot expect a contractor to keep together his men indefinitely and pay them to be idle on the site while he (the architect) waits supinely (as I think) on some report from an expert who in the end refuses to report to him. The learned official referee, however, expressed the conclusion that the “ cause ” for the purposes of cl. 20 was not the instructions of the architect but the discovery of the defects in the columns; he regarded the admission of the contractor in the witness box that he would in any event have suspended operations as conclusive. With all respect, I regard the admission of the contractor as quite irrelevant: he was only stating what any competent contractor would have done in similar circumstances. It had nothing to do with the cause. No doubt the root cause of, or reason for, the delay was the discovery of the defect, but that does not preclude the application of cl. 20.

- A So to hold would make cl. 18 and cl. 20 inapplicable to many cases to which the parties must be presumed that it was intended to apply. It is when there is a delay caused by the discovery of the defect that the architect must give directions as to what is to happen. Is the contractor to stop work, or proceed, or is he to be given an instruction to vary or modify the works under cl. 1 (2) of the conditions? Here he merely received instructions to stop work and that, for the purposes of cl. 18 and cl. 20 was the cause of the delay.

- Then His Honour held that there was a cessation of work by agreement so that the contractor could not rely on the terms of the contract and particularly on condition 18 (vi). My lords, I agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal in thinking that there was no evidence on which the official referee could reach that conclusion. As I have already pointed out, no competent contractor would carry on when faced with a crisis of this magnitude; he must allow the architect a breathing space to consider all the implications that arise. That is what happened in this case, but that provides no evidence whatever that the employers and the contractor were mutually agreeing to vary their rights and obligations under the conditions of the contract, for the finding must go as far as that to be valid. In the absence of clear and cogent evidence that the contractor was for good consideration, waiving his rights under the contract (nowhere pleaded, as SELLERS, L.J., pointed out (2)) and there is none, I can see no ground upon which this finding of His Honour can be supported.

- So that, unless precluded by the second point to which I must now turn, I am of opinion that the contractor was entitled to give a notice in November, 1961, to determine his employment. The general rule, then, is not in doubt; the contractor who performs work and supplies materials warrants that the goods which he supplies will be of good quality and reasonably fit for the purpose for which he is using them, unless the circumstances of the contract are such as to exclude any such warranty.

- Your lordships heard some argument on the question whether having regard to the great contrast between condition 21 of the R.I.B.A. contract making provision for the contractor's dealings with "nominated sub-contractors" and condition 22 making provision for the contractor's dealings with "nominated suppliers" the contract showed an intention to exclude the implied warranty in regard to "nominated suppliers". With all respect to those of your lordships who take a different view, I cannot accept this. The truth is that this complex agreement, in my opinion, made no provision for the parties' intentions in this matter at all. It was quite unnecessary that the contract should do so, for this was not a matter that had to be dealt with once and for all at that stage unless the parties chose to do so. If the point ever occurred to them, which is unlikely, they did not provide for it in their contract. That contract provided for the nomination of sub-contractors and for suppliers by the architect. The precise terms and conditions as between the employers and the contractor on which each such person is nominated must depend on the terms of the nomination at the time, whether expressed or properly to be implied in the circumstances of the case. Normally it seems to me that the usual rule of implied warranty must apply to the goods to be supplied by the contractor through the nominated supplier. Thus if the architect merely nominated Cawoods to provide the forty columns without more, for my part I can see no reason why there should not be implied in that nomination the usual obligation that the contractor warrants the quality and fitness of the columns. But if the architect nominated Cawoods to provide the columns on the terms, which he instructed the contractor to accept, that Cawoods should not be liable for any delays, defects or deficiencies whatever (no doubt a fanciful and purely theoretical example), it is difficult to see how in law or as a matter of common sense or justice the contractor could be held liable on some implied obligation for the failure of Cawoods to deliver the goods.

The truth is that every implied term (and I now quote HALSBURY'S LAWS OF A ENGLAND (3rd Edn.) vol. 8, p. 121, para. 212 summarising as I think quite accurately the effect of the leading decisions of The Moorcock (3) and Luxor (Eastbourne) Ltd. v. Cooper (4):

"... must in all cases be founded on the presumed intention of the parties and upon reason and will only be made when it is necessary in order to give the transaction that efficacy that both parties must have intended it to have, and to prevent such a failure of consideration as could not have been within the contemplation of the parties."

In the ordinary case there must be such an implication for otherwise the person to whom the contractor agrees to supply labour and materials would be left without any remedy on a failure of the goods to conform as to quality or fitness.
But in the second, if fanciful, case that I have mentioned there would seem no reason whatever for implying any obligation as to quality or fitness on the contractor who has no remedy whatever against the supplier, because he complied with the employer's instructions when contracting with the supplier.
Nor can the employer in such circumstances reasonably be presumed to have intended that he should have any such implied rights against the contractor.
So I must look at the offer and acceptance which in September, 1960, the contractor was "authorised" to execute with Cawoods but which, as a matter of commercial practice and of law, as I think, the contractor was in fact bound to execute. The terms on which Cawoods accepted, admittedly binding on the contractor and the employers, contained this clause:

"4. No complaint of any kind can be entertained (except in special circumstances justifying delay) unless it is made in writing within twenty-four hours after the time of supply of the materials or goods of which complaint is made. Although we make every effort to supply materials or goods strictly to accord with the quality or specification ordered, if any materials or goods supplied by us should be defective or not of the correct quality or specification ordered our liability shall be limited to free replacement of any materials or goods shown to be unsatisfactory. We are not under any circumstances to be liable for any consequential loss or damage caused or arising by reason of late supply or any fault, failure or defect in any materials or goods supplied by us or by reason of the same not being of the quality or specification ordered or by reason of any other matter whatsoever."

If that was a term of the contract between the contractor and Cawoods which, as I think, the contractor was by the terms of his contract with the employers bound to accept, I, for my part, cannot see how it is possible to imply a term that the contractor warranted to the employers the quality or fitness of the goods to be supplied by Cawoods.

Counsel for the appellants recognised his difficulty and argued that the contractor's implied obligation was limited to an obligation to observe the performance of cl. 4. This indeed might well have been made a matter of express agreement, for example as part of the instructions of the employers' letter of Sept. 21, 1960, but I cannot see how the law can imply such a term.

On the facts of this case I am of opinion that in respect of the contract with Cawoods, and I am dealing only with that, the circumstances are such that the implied warranty of quality and fitness is displaced.

My lords, for these reasons I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD WILBERFORCE: My Lords, the main question of law involved in this appeal is similar to that considered by this House in the appeal of Young and Marten, Ltd. v. McManus Childs, Ltd. (5). A number of other issues arise

(3) [1886-90] All E.R. Rep. 530; (1889), 14 P.D. 64.

(5) Ante p. 1169.

A in the present case and the facts on which the main question has to be decided are more complicated than those in the earlier appeal. What has to be decided is whether the contractor, as building contractor, was entitled on Oct. 23, 1961, to give notice of determination of his building contract with the appellant council ("the employers"). It was held by the official referee that he was not and consequently that the employers were entitled to damages, but this decision was

B reversed by the Court of Appeal.

The contractor's claim to determine his contract arose under a clause in the then current Royal Institute of British Architects building contract. Reliance has at one time or another been placed on various of the sub-clauses of the relevant clause, but I find it necessary to consider only one, on which, indeed, principal reliance was placed. That is cl. 18 (v) which, as incorporated into

C cl. 20, enables notice of determination to be given if the whole, or substantially the whole, of the work is delayed for one month by one or more of the causes named, which include that by reason of architect's instructions given under cl. 1. The initial dispute was whether, after defects had been found in certain concrete columns, the work was delayed by reason of these defects, or whether it was delayed by instructions given by the architect.

D In the first place, I have no doubt that architect's instructions, within the meaning of the contract, were given. What happened was that oral instructions were given on Aug. 21, 1961, after which, on the same date, the contractor wrote to the employers a letter in which he referred to the instructions and put on record that delay would result. On Aug. 23, 1961, the employers wrote back acknowledging the contractor's letter and stating that the contents were noted.

E This communication, in the circumstances, clearly amounts to written instructions. Then were these instructions the cause of the delay? The contractor relied, in order to show this, on minutes of various site meetings, attended by representatives of both sides, following the instructions, and on correspondence. He established to my satisfaction that the delay was caused by the instructions, initial and continuing, given on behalf of the architect and continued by the

F employers' representatives. It was said, against this, that the contractor agreed to the course taken, that he was an interested party and that the delay was continued in the mutual interest of both sides. I can find no trace of any binding agreement, but it can be accepted that the contractor acquiesced in the course taken. No doubt, too, as this litigation proves, he was in a sense an interested party, but the evidence proves that it was the employers who in this

G matter made all the decisions, positive and negative, as to taking tests of the cement, and as regards action, or inaction, vis-à-vis the suppliers of the columns. The contractor, if a participant in these matters, was a passive participant, ground between the millstones of council procedure and suppliers' evasion. In my opinion, the majority in the Court of Appeal were right in their view that the finding of the official referee in this matter could not be supported. I need

H not, on this point, add to what has been said by my noble and learned friend, LORD PEARCE.

That brings me to what I have called the main question in the appeal. It arises by reason of a concession made by the contractor that he could not claim the benefit of cl. 18 (v) if he was himself in breach of his obligations under the contract. On this concession, it becomes necessary to decide whether he, as

I contractor, was liable to the employers in damages for defects in the concrete columns. That he may be so liable appears from the decision in the appeal in Young and Marten, Ltd. v. McManus Childs, Ltd. (6), for here, as in that case, he agreed to supply and instal identifiable goods; but whether he is so liable depends on the circumstances and nature of his contract with the employers.

The precise contractual mechanism between the contractor and the employers is not easy to determine or to state. But it is common ground on the pleadings and on the argument that there was a binding contract between the parties constituted by the Articles of Agreement dated Nov. 21, 1960, incorporating with modifications the then current Royal Institute of British Architects conditions, and a nomination by the employers, dated Sept. 21, 1960, of Cawood Wharton & Co., Ltd. ("Cawoods") as suppliers of the pre-cast concrete columns. On the basis of this nomination, Cawoods became nominated suppliers to the contractor under the terms of the contract.

In order to understand the nature of the obligations assumed by the contractor, as regards the columns, it is necessary to state certain facts in greater detail. In the estimate prepared by the architect in July, 1960, on the basis of which tenders were invited, reference was made to a prime cost sum of £7,000 to be provided by the contractor in respect of the columns to be supplied by a nominated supplier, and it was stated that the columns would be supplied by The Bath & Portland Stone Firms, Ltd. However, it appears that the consulting engineers made contact with Cawoods, of which they had a favourable opinion. The company was supplied with detailed drawings and specifications and in due course, on July 25, 1960, submitted a quotation to supply the columns, and some beams, for £4,941 2s. 2d.—a considerable reduction on the existing figure of £7,000. With their quotation they enclosed their printed standard conditions of sale. One of these (cl. 4) was important. It set a time limit for the reception of complaints and limited liability for defective goods, or goods not of correct quality or specification, to free replacement of any goods shown to be unsatisfactory. Liability for consequential loss or damage was excluded. On Sept. 21, 1960, in their letter accepting the contractor's tender for the whole work the employers, through their architect, nominated Cawoods as suppliers of the columns, and enclosed that company's quotation "which you are authorised to accept in the sum of £4,941 2s. 2d.". On the same day, it appears, the employers rubber-stamped Cawoods' letter of quotation "Accepted through the main contractor, who will pay the account". On Sept. 27, 1960, the contractor wrote to Cawoods "we have been instructed by the architect to accept your quotation". The word "instructed" is significant.

The situation thus created was one of a special and complex character, differing greatly from that which arose in Young and Marten, Ltd. v. McManus Childs, Ltd. (7). There the employer nominated a brand article to be supplied by the manufacturer with no limitation on the contractor's freedom to contract with the manufacturer as he thought fit. The contractor could, and it would be the expectation that he would, or at least it would be his responsibility if he did not, deal with the manufacturer on terms attracting the normal conditions or warranties as to quality or fitness. But here, the design, materials, specification, quality and price were fixed between the employer and the sub-supplier without any reference to the contractor, and so far from being expected to secure conditions or warranties from the sub-supplier, he had imposed on him special conditions which severely restricted the extent of his remedy. Moreover, as reference to the main contract shows, he had no right to object to the nominated supplier, though, by contrast, the contract does provide a right to object to a nominated sub-contractor if the latter does not agree to indemnify him against his liability under the contract.

In these circumstances, so far from there being a good reason to imply in the contract (which throughout its elaborate twenty-seven clauses makes no express provision as regards this matter) a condition or warranty binding the contractor in respect of latently defective goods, the indications, drawn from the conduct of the contracting parties, are strongly against any such thing. It would, indeed, be most unjust if when the employer has (possibly to his own advantage as reflected in the price) limited the contractor's right of recourse as severely as he has (since consequential damage or loss in such cases as this may be very great and

A much in excess of the cost of replacement) he should be given by implication an unlimited right to recover damages from the contractor.

The suggestion was made that, even though a full warranty of fitness was not to be implied against the contractor, he should at least be liable to the employer to the same reduced extent as the sub-suppliers were to him. I cannot accept this suggestion. It is one thing to imply against a contractor the well-known conditions or warranties existing at common law, or under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, which are general enough to fit all types of contract, but quite another to introduce, by implication, the terms of a special condition devised by a sub-supplier-manufacturer for his protection. Such a term, calling for specific replacement of defective goods, would without adaptation be quite inappropriate against a contractor—more especially where, as has actually happened here, the manufacturer has failed; and any process of adaptation would go far beyond what the courts are willing or able to do by way of implication. To refuse the implication does not leave the employers without remedy, since the provisions in the contract for architect's instructions give ample power as regards removal and replacement of defective work and could be used so as to obtain replacement from the sub-supplier.

D In my opinion, the contractor in this case, by virtue of the special terms of his contract and of the circumstances in which the sub-contract was made, was relieved from any liability for the defective columns and was, therefore, not disabled from invoking cl. 20 and cl. 18 (v) of the contract. He was thus entitled to determine it. The appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed.

E LORD PEARSON: My Lords, the contractor by a letter from his solicitors dated Nov. 8, 1961, determined his contract with the appellant council (the "employers"). It was a building contract and made in a form issued under the sanction of the Royal Institute of British Architects. The employers in their statement of claim treated the determination as wrongful and claimed damages for the contractor's failure to complete the works under the contract. The contractor in his amended defence and counterclaim alleged that the determination was justified under cl. 20 (1) and cl. 18 (v) or (vi) of the conditions of the contract, and he counterclaimed for the payments which on that basis would be due to him under cl. 20 (2) (b) of the conditions of the contract and for certain other sums. Clause 20 (1) contains this provision:

G "... if the whole or substantially the whole of the works . . . is delayed for the period named in the appendix to these conditions by one or more of the causes . . . which are named in cl. 18 of these conditions, the contractor may, without prejudice to any other rights or remedies, thereupon by notice by registered post to the employer or architect determine the employment of the contractor under this contract."

H Clause 18 provides for extension of the time for completion of the works if in the opinion of the architect the works be delayed by certain named causes, and these causes include:

"(v) by reason of architect's instructions given in pursuance of cl. 1 of these conditions, or
 I "(vi) because the contractor has not received in due time necessary instructions from the architect for which he shall have specifically applied in writing."

The period named in the appendix, referred to in cl. 20 (1), was one month.

It has been conceded on behalf of the contractor that he would not be entitled to determine the contract for the cause named in cl. 18 (v), if the architect's instructions resulted from a breach of contract by the contractor. No similar concession was made with regard to the cause named in cl. 18 (vi). Therefore, the point is open only in relation to the cause named in cl. 18 (vi) and I will consider it only in relation to that cause. It is to be noted that cl. 1, in providing for additions to the contract sum for loss or expense caused to the contractor by compliance with architect's instructions, has the express exception "unless such instructions were issued by reason of some breach of this contract by the contractor", but there is no similar express exception in cl. 18 or cl. 20. Moreover, it is not necessary, in order to give business efficacy to cl. 18 (vi) whether for the purposes of cl. 18 or for the purposes of cl. 20, to imply any similar exception. The contractor is likely to suffer very severe loss if his carrying out of the works is delayed by lack of necessary instructions, and the architect ought to give the necessary instructions in due time, however the situation calling for instructions to be given may have arisen. In my opinion, the contractor would be entitled to determine the contract for the cause named in cl. 18 (vi), even if the situation calling for instructions to be given resulted from a breach of contract by the contractor.

It is convenient to consider next whether there was a breach of contract by the contractor. The relevant facts are not now in dispute, and it is sufficient to say that in the concrete columns delivered by the suppliers nominated by the employers there were latent defects. There was no contract between the nominated suppliers and the employers. The contractor ordered the columns from the nominated suppliers, and the columns were included in the materials to be supplied and used by the contractor under his contract with the employers. Was there in that contract an implied term that these concrete columns should be of good quality?

Normally such a term is to be implied in a contract for work and materials, whether or not there may be also an implied term that the materials are fit for some particular purpose for which they are required. In G. H. Myers & Co. v. Brent Cross Service Co. (8) DU PARCQ, J., said (9):

"... it would not be true to say that wherever you find a contract to do work and supply materials it necessarily follows, even apart from special conditions, that the person supplying the materials is liable if some of them are defective by reason of latent defect. That depends upon the terms of the contract, and I think that the true view is that a person contracting to do work and supply materials warrants that the materials which he uses will be of good quality and reasonably fit for the purpose for which he is using them, unless the circumstances of the contract are such as to exclude any such warranty"

The principle as there stated by DU PARCQ, J., is founded on the presumed intention of the parties. Normally the intention to be inferred is that the person contracting to supply materials assumes an obligation to supply materials of good quality (which may be equated with normal or reasonable or adequate or merchantable quality), but there may, in a particular case, be special circumstances showing that such an intention is not to be inferred. There is no uncertainty as to the principle, but there is difficulty in deciding on its application to the facts of the present case.

Broadly, I think that there are in this case three special circumstances or factors to be taken into account in deciding whether, according to the presumable intention of the parties, the contractor assumed an obligation to supply concrete columns of good quality under his contract with the employers.

1. The suppliers from whom the concrete columns were to be, and were in fact, obtained by the contractor, were nominated by the employers. This fact is not in itself sufficient to exclude the contractor's normal obligation to supply materials of good quality. The obligation is needed in order to afford to the employers a remedy, and to impose on the nominated suppliers an effective liability, for the bad quality of these materials. In the absence of such an obligation the employers could not recover any damages from the contractor, and the

A contractor not being himself liable could not recover more than nominal damages from the nominated suppliers.

2. The architect on behalf of the employers wrote to the contractor a letter authorising him to accept a quotation from the nominated suppliers, which severely restricted their liability in respect of defective materials, and the contractor accepted the quotation accordingly. The architect's letter, or at any rate the part of it authorising acceptance of the quotation, must, in my view, be regarded as forming part of the contract between the contractor and the employers. These circumstances ought to affect the contractor's responsibility. It seems to me, however, that they are apt to diminish, rather than wholly to exclude, his responsibility. As the contractor was authorised to obtain the concrete columns on terms restricting his right of redress against the nominated suppliers in respect of defects in the columns supplied, the employers' right of redress against the contractor in respect of the same defects ought to be similarly restricted. A term to that effect is, in my opinion, properly and necessarily to be implied in order to give effect to the presumed intention of the parties. There would be obvious injustice if such a term were not implied. I do not think that it is lacking in precision: for instance, in the present case both the nominated suppliers' liability to the contractor and the contractor's liability to the employers would be limited to replacing the defective columns or paying by way of damages the cost of such replacement.

3. There is the contrast between cl. 21 and cl. 22. Clause 21 deals with nominated sub-contractors, and it contains a provision that no nominated sub-contractor shall be employed against whom the contractor shall make reasonable objection or (save where the architect and the contractor shall otherwise agree) who will not enter into a contract of indemnity in favour of the contractor. Clause 22 deals with nominated suppliers and has no such provision for the protection of the contractor. On the other hand, just as cl. 21 provides that "all specialists or others who have been nominated or selected by the architect are hereby declared to be sub-contractors employed by the contractor", so cl. 22 provides that all specialists or others "who have been nominated or selected by the architect to supply such materials or goods are hereby declared to be suppliers to the contractor". If that form of words used in cl. 21 has the effect (as I think it must) of imposing on the contractor responsibility for the quality of work done by nominated sub-contractors, the very similar form of words used in cl. 22 would naturally have the similar effect of imposing on the contractor responsibility for the quality of materials supplied by nominated suppliers.

The special circumstances of this contract do not seem to me to be sufficient to exclude the usual obligation of a contractor to supply materials of good quality. As SELLERS, L.J., said (10):

"As I see it, the contractual obligation will only work satisfactorily if the risk of the nominated supplier failing to fulfil his contract falls on the contractor, and that seems to me to be the intention of the parties as revealed by the contract."

It would be a most unbusinesslike arrangement, if the nominated suppliers could with virtual impunity supply materials of bad quality and the employers would have no remedy.

Then, if (as I think) the contractor had the obligation to supply materials of good quality, the supply of concrete columns which were defective (though the defects were latent) constituted a breach of it, and the architect's instructions to cease work on the concrete columns resulted from that breach. Then by virtue of the concession referred to above the contractor must be considered not to be entitled to rely on cl. 18 (v) as justifying his determination of the contract under cl. 20.

He is, however, not prevented by his breach of contract from relying for this purpose on cl. 18 (vi), the words of which are "because the contractor has not received in due time necessary instructions from the architect for which he shall have specifically applied in writing". But in relation to cl. 18 (vi) the learned official referee made a finding as follows:

"In my judgment neither the initial cessation of work nor the delay which followed were caused for the reasons covered by cl. 18 (vi). 'Due time' referred to in that sub-clause was when the architect was required to give the contractor the necessary instructions after they had ascertained what was the cause of the defect and the extent to which replacement would be required. In other words, the delay, after the initial cessation, was caused by the parties pursuing the course agreed to by all of them to which I have referred before."

Prima facie this is a finding of fact by the official referee, and so not subject to appeal and conclusive on the point with which it deals. It has been suggested that there is involved an error of law inasmuch as there was no evidence of the supposed agreement. One has to consider in this connexion the documentary evidence, consisting mainly of letters and minutes of site meetings, and also the oral evidence of several witnesses. Having considered the evidence, although a different conclusion would have been possible, I am unable to say there was no evidence to support the finding. Therefore, in my opinion, the finding must be upheld, and the contractor fails on this point under cl. 18 (vi), as well as on the point under cl. 18 (v) which I have considered above. The contractor has not established his claim that he was entitled to determine the contract.

Accordingly, in my opinion, the appeal should be allowed and the decision of the official referee should be restored. But as my noble and learned friends hold the contrary opinion, the appeal will be dismissed.

OSGERBY v. RUSHTON.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Parker, C.J., Sachs, L.J., and Bridge, J.), June 20, 1968.]

The respondent was charged with disorderly conduct in a public place while drunk, contrary to s. 12* of the Licensing Act, 1872. He was acquitted of the offence on the submission that the relevant provisions of s. 12 had been repealed. By s. 106 (5) the Act of 1967 was to come into force on days appointed by order, different days being able to be appointed for different purposes. By s. 103 (2)† the enactments specified in Sch. 7 to the Act of 1967, which included the essential words of s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, were repealed. D Case Stated.

This was a Case Stated by justices for the parts of Holland in the county of Lincoln acting for the petty sessional division of Boston in respect of their adjudication in the magistrates' court at Boston on Mar. 22 and Apr. 19, 1968. On Feb. 21, 1968, at Boston the respondent, Jack Rushton, was arrested on a charge that he had on that day in a certain place, namely Beltons Caravan Site, Marsh Lane, Boston, been guilty whilst drunk of disorderly behaviour contrary to s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and the Penalties for Drunkenness Act, 1962. On Mar. 20, 1968, an information charging the offence was laid by the appellant, John William Osgerby. The hearing of the information was adjourned on Mar. 22 to Apr. 19, 1968, when no evidence was called. The respondent pleaded not guilty, and it was submitted on his behalf that, by the combined effect of s. 103 and s. 91 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 and the Criminal Justice Act 1967 (Commencement No. 1) Order 1967, s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, had been repealed on Oct. 1, 1967, and that s. 91 of the Act of 1967, which created a new offence to replace the offence formerly subsisting under s. 12 of the Act of 1872, had not been brought into force, with the consequence that the offence with which the respondent was charged did not exist. The justices were of the opinion that the respondent's contention was sound. They dismissed the information. The appellant now appealed.

The respondent did not appear and was not represented.

H LORD PARKER, C.J.: The respondent having pleaded not guilty, a submission was made by his legal representative that he was in fact being charged with an offence unknown to the law in that the relevant words in s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, had been repealed by the Criminal Justice Act 1967. What gave rise to this suggestion was the fact that by the Criminal Justice Act 1967 (Commencement No. 1) Order 1967 (1), it was provided that the provisions set out in the schedules to the order should come into force on the dates mentioned in the headings and Sch. 1, specifying provisions coming into force on Oct. 1, 1967, included s. 103 of the Act of 1967. Section 103 (2) of the Act of 1967 provided that "The enactments specified in Sch. 7 to this Act . . . are hereby repealed to the extent specified in the third column of that schedule."

Turning to Sch. 7 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, and Pt. 1 thereof, there is to be found as a repeal applying to England and Wales, the words from "who in any highway " down to " behaviour or " in s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872—a A repeal of the very words creating the offence with which this man was charged.

It is quite plain, if one looks at the Criminal Justice Act 1967, that the reason B why those words in s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, were being repealed was because by s. 91 a new offence was created. Section 91 (1) provides:

" Any person who in any public place is guilty, while drunk, of disorderly C behaviour may be arrested without warrant by any person and shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £50."

That increases the financial penalty for the offence but cuts out what had D previously been a penalty of imprisonment. Section 91 (5) provides:

" An order under s. 106 of this Act appointing a day for the coming into E force of the foregoing provisions of this section shall not be made unless the Secretary of State is satisfied that sufficient suitable accommodation is available for the care and treatment of persons convicted of being drunk and disorderly."

The idea underlying these enactments was that there should no longer be imprison- F ment for drunks but that suitable accommodation should be provided for their treatment. Needless to say, the provisions have not yet come into force because the suitable accommodation has not been found. The justices no doubt appreciated that difficulty but they felt that the words of the statutory instrument bringing s. 103 into force on Oct. 1 were so plain that, despite the fact that s. 91 had not come into force, the offence of disorderly behaviour while drunk had gone completely. In my judgment the justices were clearly wrong in that if they had gone on to consider Sch. 1 to the Order of 1967 they would have found as a final entry, " So much of Pt. 1 of Sch. 7 [that is Sch. 7 to the Act of 1967] as is set out in the appendix hereto ". Thereafter in the appendix is set out a number of the repeals which appear in Sch. 7 to the Act of 1967 but not, and very naturally not s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872. It is quite clear that while s. 103 was being brought into force, as it had to be if certain of the repeals were to be treated as immediate repeals, the appendix limited the effect of s. 103 to those repeals which are set out in that appendix.

I would only add that we are told that the justices may have been misled by G certain notes which appear in the current edition of PATERSON LICENSING ACTS (76th Edn., 1968) where at p. 262 is to be found s. 12 of the Act of 1872 set out as it will be when s. 91 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 comes into force. Where the words which will be repealed occur there are dots and there is a reference to note (e), which says, on p. 265, " Words omitted relating to riotous and disorderly behaviour were repealed by the Criminal Justice Act 1967, Sch. 7 ".
 Again, at p. 284 of the current edition a number of offences are set out which appeared in Sch. 1 to the Inebriates Act, 1898, and the second of those, which appears in italics, is s. 12, and the note at the foot of the page says:

" Although the schedule has not been amended, the passages printed in H italics are no longer effective because of repeals by the Criminal Justice Act 1967 Sch. 7."

In my judgment the editors jumped the gun in those two passages and, as I I have said, the justices may thereby have been misled. In my judgment this appeal succeeds and this case should go back to the justices to continue the hearing.

BRIDGE, J.: I also agree.

WESTMINSTER BANK LTD. v. BEVERLEY BOROUGH COUNCIL AND ANOTHER.

C

A county council was both highway authority for county roads and planning authority. A bank applied to the borough council (to which planning powers were delegated) for planning permission for an extension at the rear of its premises. This was refused, and, after a local inquiry (which was subsequently re-opened), the bank's appeal to the Minister was dismissed. The reason for the dismissal of the appeal, as also for the refusal of planning permission, was that as a result of a local planning scheme for the town centre generally, the street behind the bank would become a main internal traffic road and would require to be widened. The scheme was not incorporated in the development plan, but was approved by the county council, and the proposed road widening was approved by it as highway authority. No improvement line had been prescribed under the relevant statutory power for road widening, viz., s. 72 of the Highway Act, 1959. Under that enactment a person whose land was injuriously affected by the prescribing of an improvement line would become entitled to compensation. Under the course adopted, viz., the refusal of planning permission, a right to compensation might not arise or compensation might be less.

Held (SALMON, L.J., dissenting): the proposed future use of land as a highway was something to which the planning authority were entitled under the general planning legislation to have regard in determining whether or not to grant planning permission to build on the land, notwithstanding that the Highways Act, 1959, contained specific provisions enabling the highway authority to control building within an improvement line to which a highway was to be widened (see p. 1202, letter E, p. 1204, letter A, p. 1205, letter A, and p. 1207, letter I, post); accordingly the planning authority had not misused its statutory power over the grant of planning permission for an object for which Parliament did not intend it to be used, and the Minister's decision was not ultra vires (see p. 1202, letter G, and p. 1205, letter G, post).

Appeal.

This was an appeal by the Minister of Housing and Local Government from a decision of DONALDSON, J., dated Feb. 29, 1968, and reported ante p. 104, whereby he quashed a decision of the appellant dated Jan. 31, 1967, dismissing an appeal by Westminster Bank, Ltd. against the refusal of Beverley Borough Council to grant planning permission for alterations and extensions at the bank's premises at Beverley. The facts are set out in the decision of DONALDSON, J., and summarised in the judgment of DANCKWERTS, L.J. E

S. C. Silkin, Q.C., and G. Slynn for the Minister.

D. P. Kerrigan, Q.C. and A. B. Dawson for the bank.

The Beverley Borough Council did not appeal and were not represented.

DANCKWERTS, L.J.: The title of this appeal in the cause list is somewhat misleading because this is an appeal of the Minister of Housing and Local Government against a decision of DONALDSON, J. (1) in favour of the Westminster Bank, Ltd., dated Feb. 29, 1968. The Borough Council of Beverley was also a party before the judge, but the borough council does not appear on this appeal. The case concerns the powers of a planning authority under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1962, and is just the kind of case which is liable to arise in the overgoverned state in which the citizens of this country live. DONALDSON, J., was oppressed by the deprivation of property rights which the statute appeared to produce, and that is a view with which I sympathise completely. The question, however, really is whether the arbitrary results which modern legislation has produced admit of any protection by the courts in their function of guarding the rights of a subject against oppression by the executive. It is true that the subject in the present case is a bank, but even a bank is entitled to protection against unlawful deprivation of the bank's lawful rights. F

In this case the County Council of the East Riding of Yorkshire is both the highway authority in respect of county roads, and is also the planning authority, but the county council have delegated some of its planning functions to the Borough Council of Beverley in the East Riding of Yorkshire. G

The site concerned is the back portion of the property of the bank which abuts on a narrow road in Beverley called Laigate. On this portion of their property the bank wish to build a strong room, a manager's office, and a waiting room, and wish to alter the lavatory accommodation. For this planning permission is required, and this the bank have been refused by the borough council H

* See ante pp. 106-109

(1) Ante p. 104. I

A acting under the powers delegated to them. Putting the position generally, the grievance of the bank is that the permission has been refused because the borough council has produced a development plan and a map for this part of Beverley which will involve the widening of Laigate from its present width of sixteen feet, including pavements, to forty feet with a twenty-four feet roadway. The plan has now been approved by the borough council, but has not yet been brought before the Minister for his approval. The bank's case is that provisions for the widening of roads are properly the subject of the fixing of "improvement lines" or "building lines" under s. 72 and s. 73 of the Highways Act, 1959, which would involve present payments of compensation for injurious affection, and should not be dealt with under planning legislation which might produce reduced compensation (if any). One of the objections raised on behalf of the bank is that the matter of this development has been under discussion for twenty years, and even now there is no real prospect of the development being carried out within ten years or any other certain period in the future. This is a point which is not without force because refusal of planning permission might sterilise development of the banks' land for an indefinite period.

D The history of the case and dates are as follows: the first refusal of planning permission by the Beverley Borough Council was in April 1962. A second refusal occurred in April, 1964, and the bank then appealed to the Minister. In March, 1965 there was an inquiry by Mr. R. W. Deans, whose report, dated Apr. 22, 1965, did not receive a favourable reception by the Minister. On Mar. 10, 1966, the Minister's decision was adverse to the bank, but a further inquiry was offered by the Minister and accordingly on Nov. 1, 1966, a further inquiry took place before Mr. J. P. Jackson. His report dated Nov. 23, 1966, was received with more approval by the Minister, and, on Jan. 21, 1967, the Minister gave his decision by letter again against the bank's application. I do not regard this history with any admiration. DONALDSON, J. (2) has quashed the decision of the Minister. At the hearing before DONALDSON, J., the bank's case was essentially based on two contentions: (i) if the local planning authority or the Minister refused permission for development for no other reason than that of thereby avoiding the creation of an improvement or building line for highway purposes, the refusal is ultra vires. The basis of this argument, as I understand it, was that the proper way to deal with such an intention was by invoking the provisions of either s. 72 or s. 73 of the Highways Act, 1959, with the resulting effects in regard to compensation. (ii) The Minister, being under an admitted obligation to give sufficient reasons for his decisions, failed to give reasons for his decisions, and the bank's interests have been substantially prejudiced thereby.

In regard to the first point, we were referred to the often quoted statement by LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE in Colonial Sugar Refining Co., Ltd. v. Melbourne Harbour Trust Comrs. (3):

H "A statute should not be held to take away private rights of property without compensation unless the intention to do so is expressed in clear and unambiguous terms."

This is a well recognised and excellent principle, but unfortunately the Town and Country Planning Act, 1962, contains numerous provisions interfering with rights of property of a subject, sometimes on terms of compensation and sometimes without such terms. In such a situation the statement by LORD WARRINGTON is either excluded or is satisfied, according to the manner in which it is viewed. Consequently this point must fail, I fear.

I As regards the second point, it is plain, in my opinion, that in his decision the Minister made clear, expressly or by implication, the reasons which induced him to reach his decision. This appears from two paragraphs in the Minister's letter of decision:

(2) Ante p. 104.

(3) [1927] A.C. 343 at p. 359.

"The Minister has considered the reports of the Inspectors, Mr. R. W. Deans . . . who held a local inquiry on Mar. 30, 1965, and Mr. J. P. Jackson . . . who re-opened the inquiry on Nov. 1, 1966. Copies of both reports are enclosed. The local planning authority's reason for refusing planning permission, as given in the notice of their decision, was that 'the proposed development might prejudice the possible future widening of Lairgate', and the question of whether this is a proper or sufficient reason for refusing the planning permission sought is the only matter in dispute in the appeal."

Moreover, in para. 7 of the case for the bank, the following statement appears:

"It is significant that the machinery of the Highways Act has not been invoked. If the road widening is a necessary and viable step in the interests of road efficiency, action under s. 73 of the Act is the only proper means of achieving the objective. It is a misuse of the powers under the planning Act to whittle away an owner's rights of compensation by refusing permission which would otherwise be appropriate, under the pretext of safeguarding a scheme which has no statutory standing, so as to protect, in the eventuality, the public purse at the expense of individuals."

The case of Hall & Co., Ltd. v. Shoreham-by-Sea Urban District Council (4) was referred to—which is a different case and indeed was only quoted for a dictum taken out of the judgment.

So the point made by the bank was plainly brought to the attention of the Minister and was plainly rejected by him. Reference to the Town and Country Planning Act, 1962, shows that the Minister was entitled to take into consideration highway matters. See s. 17 (1), which requires a planning authority to have regard to the provisions of the development plan so far as material to the application for planning permission, and to any other material considerations. The widening of Lairgate was certainly material, and, perhaps vital, to the scheme which was to be carried out by the material plan. Indeed the grounds for the refusal of the bank's application for planning permission were, in my opinion, reasonable and a matter of common sense. If Lairgate needed to be widened in order to carry the traffic anticipated under the planning authority's scheme, it would be absurd and wasteful to allow buildings to be erected on Lairgate, which would have to be removed and destroyed when the scheme was carried out. Moreover, it may be that the provisions of s. 72 or s. 73 of the Highways Act, 1959, might be employed at a later date. I do not think that the Minister's decision was ultra vires. For these reasons, in my view, the judge reached the wrong conclusion and result in quashing the Minister's order, and the appeal must be allowed.

DIPLOCK, L.J.: Westminster Bank, Ltd., was minded to build a new strong room at the rear of their premises in the non-county Borough of Beverley where they abutted into Lairgate, a county road for which the East Riding County Council is the highway authority. This would constitute "development" under s. 12 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1962, for which planning permission was required under s. 13. The local planning authority was the county council, which had delegated to the borough council its powers under s. 17 of the Act of 1962 as to determining applications for planning permission in respect of land in the borough.

Planning permission was refused on the ground that the proposed development might prejudice the future widening of Lairgate from its existing width of some sixteen feet to twenty feet to an intended overall width of forty feet. After a number of vicissitudes into which it is irrelevant to enter, the Minister, on appeal under s. 23 of the Act of 1962, upheld the borough's refusal on the same ground. An appeal from the Minister's decision was brought to the High Court under

A s. 179 of the Act of 1962. It was allowed by DONALDSON, J., (5), and comes to this court on appeal from his judgment. He held that the decision of the Minister was not within the powers of the Act of 1962. The naked question for us is whether on an application for planning permission for development which involves the carrying out of building operations a local planning authority is entitled to take into consideration as a ground for refusing permission the fact
 B that the proposed building would encroach on land which the planning authority propose should be used for widening an existing highway.

The relevant facts are that the planning authority have prepared a scheme for redevelopment of the town centre of Beverley which would involve Lairgate's becoming a main traffic route and necessitate its widening to a width of about forty feet. If so widened, it would include part of the bank's land on which they
 C proposed to build the strong-room. The redevelopment scheme has now reached a stage at which it has been delineated on a town map. The town map does not form part of a "development plan" submitted to the Minister under Part 2 of the Act of 1962, nor is it the present intention of the planning authority that it should be incorporated in a "development plan". It is a local scheme which has been published by the planning authority and discloses the manner
 D in which they propose that the land in the town centre of Beverley should be used in the future. The scheme as delineated on the map has been officially approved by the county council as planning authority and the widening of Lairgate which forms part of the scheme has been approved by it as highway authority.

One further preliminary matter should be mentioned. The question whether the bank would be entitled to recover any, and if so any particular measure of,
 E compensation on refusal of planning permission does not arise directly in this appeal. That would be a matter, not for the planning authority or the Minister, but for the Lands Tribunal. The facts disclosed in the documents before us do not enable us to say whether or not the bank would be entitled, as they claim that they would, to recover compensation for refusal of planning permission under s. 123 of the Act of 1962 or to require the authority to purchase their interest in F the land under s. 138 and s. 139 of the Act of 1962. I say this because the judge cited as the starting point of the bank's argument, which he accepted—I quote from the judgment (6):

"... the principle of law formulated by LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE in Colonial Sugar Refining Co., Ltd. v. Melbourne Harbour Trust Comrs. (7) that 'a statute should not be held to take away private rights of property G without compensation unless the intention to do so is expressed in clear and unambiguous terms'."

With great respect, I do not think that this assists in the determination of the present case. The whole purpose of planning control under Part 3 of the Act of 1962 is to take away private rights of property. Any refusal of planning permission does just this. Parts 6 and 7 of the Act of 1962, which extend to forty-one sections, H contain elaborate provisions as to the circumstances in which compensation is payable to the subject for losses incurred by him as a result of the exercise of planning powers; and Part 8, comprising another twenty-four sections, deals with other compensatory remedies available to the subject. In my view the Act of 1962 expresses in clear and unambiguous terms the intention of Parliament that
 I compensation for deprivation of private rights of property as a result of the exercise of planning powers was to be recoverable in the circumstances and in the measure provided in the statute and not otherwise.

The learned judge purported to decide in favour of the bank on two grounds. The first, based on the maxim generalia specialibus non derogant, (see Bishop of Gloucester v. Cunningham (8) and Mirman's Properties, Ltd. v. Chertsey Urban District Council (9)) was that since the Highways Act, 1959, contains detailed provisions enabling a highway authority to control building within an "improvement line" to which it proposes that a highway should be widened, the general provisions of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1962, should not be construed as empowering a local planning authority to control this particular kind of development. A

The alternative ground was that, even if the erection of a building within the line to which it was proposed a highway should be widened required planning permission, it was ultra vires the planning authority to refuse such permission for the sole reason that the building proposed to be erected would be within such line. B

The first ground if it was really intended to differ from the alternative ground, can be disposed of shortly. Any building operation which does not fall within s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1962 clearly requires planning permission under s. 13, whether or not it would be within the line to which it is proposed that a highway should be widened. It is not suggested that the planning authority could not refuse planning permission on some other ground, such as the use to which it is to be put or aesthetic grounds. Furthermore, it appears to me to be as plain as can be from many of the provisions of the Act of 1962, that the use in the future of land as a highway, whatever may be its existing use, is a matter which the local planning authority is entitled to control in the exercise of the powers conferred on it by the Act of 1962. The site of new and widened highways may be indicated and defined on development plans under s. 4. See, in particular, s. 4 (3), which provides: C

"(3) Subject to the provisions of any regulations made under this Act for regulating the form and content of development plans, any such plan shall include such maps and such descriptive matter as may be necessary to illustrate the proposals in question with such degree of particularity as may be appropriate to different parts of the areas; and any such plan may in particular—(a) define the sites of proposed roads . . ." E

Moreover, where they are so indicated, the planning authority is required by s. 17 to have regard to them in dealing with any application for planning permission under that section. That the carrying out of work on highways is development within the meaning of s. 12 is plain from s. 12 (2) (b). Section 14 (7) and (8) of the Act of 1962 give to the Minister of Housing and Local Government overriding powers in the event of any conflict between the powers of highway authorities under the sections of the Highways Act, 1959, which are relevant to the present appeal, and the powers of planning authorities under the Act of 1962. Even where the local planning authority is itself the highway authority, it requires planning permission (in this case from the Minister) under s. 42 to enlarge a highway unless it obtains deemed planning permission from the Minister of Transport under s. 41. Section 138 (1) (c) of the Act of 1962 refers expressly to land which F

"is land indicated in a development plan (otherwise than by being allocated or defined as mentioned in the last preceding paragraph) as land on which a highway is proposed to be constructed or land to be included in a highway as proposed to be improved or altered." G

All this in my view makes it clear beyond peradventure that the powers of a local planning authority extend to defining what land in their area is proposed for use as a highway in the future, including land proposed to be incorporated in an existing highway when widened. They may do this formally in a development plan prepared under Part 2 of the Act of 1962, in which case they are bound to have regard to that proposed use in determining whether or not to grant permission to build on that land. They are not, however, bound to define it in a development plan. If they do not do so, but deal with it less formally as part of a detailed scheme approved by them for a particular area, the proposed future H I

- A use of land as a highway is in my view prima facie at any rate a material consideration to which they are entitled to have regard in determining whether or not to grant planning permission to build on the land.

This brings me to DONALDSON, J.'s second ground, which is that because of the provisions of s. 72 of the Highways Act, 1959, it was ultra vires the Minister, in determining whether or not to grant planning permission, to take into consideration the fact that the proposed building would be erected on land proposed to be used as part of a highway. This kind of ultra vires is sometimes referred to as unreasonable exercise of a power. The term is misleading, however, unless the limited meaning of the expression "unreasonable" is firmly borne in mind. It has been defined in two ways, viz., by LORD DENNING in Pyx Granite Co., Ltd. v. Ministry of Housing and Local Government (10), where he said this:

- C "The principles to be applied are not, I think, in doubt. Although the planning authorities are given very wide powers to impose 'such conditions as they think fit', nevertheless the law says that those conditions, to be valid, must fairly and reasonably relate to the permitted development. The planning authority are not at liberty to use their powers for an ulterior object, however desirable that object may seem to them in the public interest."

Moreover, LORD GREENE, M.R., in Associated Provincial Picture Houses, Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corpn. (11) expressed it thus, that in considering whether an authority having so unlimited power has acted unreasonably

- E "... the court is entitled to investigate the action of the local authority with a view to seeing whether it has taken into account matters which it ought not to take into account, or, conversely, has refused to take into account or neglected to take into account matters which it ought to take into account ... The power of the court to interfere ... is not that of an appellate authority to override a decision of the local authority, but is that of a judicial authority which is concerned, and concerned only, to see whether the local authority has contravened the law by acting in excess of the powers which Parliament has confided in it."

- These two ways of stating the matter were cited with approval by LORD JENKINS in Fawcett Properties, Ltd. v. Buckingham County Council (12). Hall & Co., Ltd. v. Shoreham-by-Sea Urban District Council (13) was not a case of refusal of planning permission, i.e., the prevention of development which is the express purpose of s. 12 and s. 13, but an attempt to achieve by the imposition of conditions the construction of a highway by the applicant on his own land at his own expense.

Both ways of putting it appear to me really to amount to this: it is a misuse of a power granted by statute for one object to use it in order to achieve a different object for which Parliament did not intend it to be used.

- H It is contended that the object of preventing building within the line to which it is proposed that an existing highway should be widened was intended by Parliament to be achieved by the exercise of powers conferred on highway authorities under s. 72 of, and Sch. 9 to, the Highways Act, 1959, and not by the method of control of building operations conferred on planning authorities by s. 12 and s. 13 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1962.

- I The first thing to be noted is that it is purely coincidental that Lairgate was a county road for which the planning authority happened to be also the highway authority. The argument if valid must apply equally to highways for which under s. 1 (2) of the Highways Act, 1959, a borough or urban district council, which is not a planning authority, is the highway authority. The relevant power of the highway authority is to be found in s. 72 of the Act of 1959, which re-enacted with some modifications the provisions of s. 5 of the Road Improvement Act, 1925, and s. 33 of the Public Health Act, 1925. I will read the relevant part of s. 72:

"(1) Where in the opinion of a highway authority—(a) a street, being a highway maintainable at the public expense by them, is narrow or inconvenient, or without any sufficiently regular boundary line, or (b) it is necessary or desirable that such a street should be widened, the authority may prescribe in relation to either one side or both sides of the street, or at or within a distance of fifteen yards from any street corner, a line to which the street is to be widened (in this section referred to as an 'improvement line')."

"(2) Where an improvement line prescribed under this section in relation to any street is in force, then, subject to the next following subsection, no new building shall be erected, and no permanent excavation below the level of the street shall be made, nearer to the centre line of the street than the improvement line, except with the consent of the authority who prescribed the line, and the authority may give a consent for such period and subject to such conditions as they may deem expedient . . ."

"(3) Where an authority have prescribed an improvement line under this section, a person aggrieved by the decision to prescribe the line or by the refusal of consent under the last foregoing subsection or by the period for which the consent is given or any conditions attached thereto may appeal to a court of quarter sessions."

"(6) Where in the opinion of a highway authority an improvement line prescribed by them under this section, or any part of such a line, is no longer necessary or desirable and should be revoked, they may revoke the line or that part thereof."

"(8) Any person whose property is injuriously affected by the prescribing of an improvement line under this section, shall, subject to the following provisions thereof, be entitled to recover from the authority who prescribed the line compensation for the injury sustained."

It is to be observed that neither the planning authority as such nor it in its capacity as county council has any power to require a highway authority to prescribe an improvement line for any non-county road or to refrain from revoking one, or to dictate whether or not consent to building within the improvement line shall be granted in any particular case. The ultimate control both as to the prescription of the line and as to consent to building within lies with quarter sessions on appeal; and this is so even where the county council is itself the highway authority. If the argument accepted by the learned judge is right, then even if the planning authority, not being itself the highway authority, had defined in its statutory development plan the proposed future width of the highway, the highway authority could either prescribe no improvement line, or prescribe a different improvement line, or revoke a line already prescribed, or consent to building within it, without any control by the planning authority or the Minister and subject only to control by quarter sessions. If no improvement line were prescribed by the highway authority, or their decision to prescribe a line were overruled on appeal to quarter sessions, and the planning authority had no power to refuse planning permission for building operations on the ground that the proposed building was within the line to which it was proposed by the planning authority an existing borough or urban district highway should be widened, there would be no way of preventing frontagers building up to the limits of the existing highway buildings which would have to be demolished as soon as the time came to widen the highway and recovering compensation for the value of the buildings demolished. Apart from the economic waste inevitably involved, this might well make the eventual widening of the highway impracticable and with it the whole scheme of related development of which the widening of the highway was an integral part. For

A my part, I cannot ascribe to Parliament so bizarre an intention of removing from the control of local planning authorities and the Minister of Housing and Local Government so important an aspect of planning the future use to be made of land in this overcrowded and over-vehicled kingdom.

The judge reached the contrary conclusion on the grounds that where an improvement line is prescribed by a highway authority all frontagers whose land is affected thereby are entitled to immediate compensation for injurious affection, whereas there is no right to compensation, on the same basis at any rate, when planning permission is refused on grounds that the proposed building would be within the line to which it was proposed by the planning authority that the highway should be widened. He expressed the principle which he accepted in these terms (14):

C "The complexity of modern society necessitates a multiplicity of controls whereby the interests of the individuals are subordinated to those of the community. We remain, however, members of a free society. In such a society a reasonable man faced with the need to restrict the freedom of the individual for the benefit of the community and faced with two possible courses of action, only one of which involves compensating the individual, must surely adopt that course. The Minister, or more accurately the lady who was his alter ego for the purposes of this appeal, has adopted the other course."

This is tantamount to saying that wherever Parliament has provided two alternative ways of achieving the public weal it is ultra vires to make use of the cheaper one.

E Read literally, it would suggest that in considering an application for planning permission, the planning authority and the Minister on an appeal would have to enquire whether the particular applicant would be likely to recover more compensation under the Act of 1962 if his application were refused than he would have recovered if a corresponding improvement line had been prescribed by the highway authority under s. 72 of the Act of 1959 and building permission refused under that Act. Conversely, also, a highway authority and quarter sessions on appeal would have to make a similar enquiry presumably as respects all the individual frontagers before determining whether to prescribe an improvement line. For, as I have pointed out, compensation on refusal of planning permission may be payable to the applicant under the Act of 1962, as the bank claims that it would be payable to them in the present case under s. 123 of, and Sch. 3 to, the Act of 1962, or possibly under other provisions of that Act relating to compensation.

I cannot think that the judge intended that; but if he did not, I think that one is driven back to the wider argument that the Highways Act, 1959, was intended by Parliament to provide the only method by which building within the line to which it was intended to be widened should be controlled, and that the Act of 1962, being a general Act, must not be construed as providing an alternative method of control by a different authority (viz., a planning authority rather than a highway authority) over that special subject-matter. For the reasons which I have indicated I agree with DANCKWERTS, L.J., that he was wrong.

I In my view the fact that the operation proposed would involve building within the line to which it was proposed by the planning authority that the existing highway should be widened was a material consideration to which the local planning authority and the Minister were entitled to have regard. Indeed I would go further and say that if they did not have regard to it, it might, under the words of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Associated Provincial Picture Houses, Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corpn. (15) be said that they had disregarded matters which ought to be taken into account. I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

SALMON, L.J.: At common law a man was entitled to do what he liked with his own, providing that in doing so he did not injure his neighbour. The complexity of modern society has made it necessary to introduce a multiplicity of statutory controls which have largely eroded this principle, some think unfortunately. These controls deal in detail with circumstances in which it has been thought that the exercise of private rights might injure the community. The power to operate many of these controls has been left in the hands of local authorities, subject to an appeal to the Minister concerned. The Minister himself has, of course, no time to deal personally with the multifarious matters that arise in this way. His powers are necessarily delegated to civil servants of his department. It is with them that the ultimate power in reality resides. The courts, quite rightly, have no power to interfere with policy or administrative decisions merely because they do not agree with them. Policy and administrative decisions are clearly within the sphere of the executive alone. Accordingly the courts are powerless to intervene to protect the private citizen unless the Ministries concerned have exceeded the wide powers conferred on them by Parliament or have abused those powers, for example, by a wholly unreasonable exercise of discretion. As the learned judge observed (16), however, we still live in a free society. We shall continue to do so only so long as the courts continue, as they always have done, to exercise the power which they still possess of restraining any bureaucratic invasion of private rights which is not authorised by law.

The Highways Act, 1959, contains a complete code in relation to highways, their maintenance, improvement and construction. It is quite true that the highway authorities who are primarily responsible for carrying out the duties under the Act of 1959 are subject to control by the planning authorities, and, should there be a clash between the two—which perhaps does not often occur—planning control prevails. It is plain that Parliament, when it enacted the Highways Act, 1959, and the Acts which it replaced, clearly contemplated that highway improvement schemes might take a number of years to implement. The highway authority might be minded to widen a street at some time or other, but might not intend to do so for many years. It may be that the property owners whose land adjoined the highway had not built right up to the line of the street as it then existed, or that if they had, they were planning to demolish the property and rebuild. Clearly if between the time when the scheme to widen the highway was formulated and the time when it was carried out, the property owners did either of the things to which I have alluded, the cost to the highway authority of carrying out the scheme in the future would be very much increased. Building or rebuilding on the land to be compulsorily acquired would increase its value and add to the compensation and demolition costs for which the highway authorities would be liable. In order to protect highway authorities against this increased liability, s. 72 of the Act of 1959 and its statutory predecessors were passed. These gave the highway authority the power to prescribe an improvement line, that is to say, to put a line on a map showing the proposed extent to which the highway was to be widened. Once this improvement line was prescribed, no property owner could build on the highway side of the line without the consent of the highway authority. This was a sensible measure to protect the highway authority. On the other hand, it was obvious to Parliament that once an improvement line was prescribed, this would sterilise the adjoining land and might injuriously affect its value. How much it might injuriously affect the value of the land would depend on whether there was any real prospect of it being built on or any reconstruction taking place on it but for the improvement line. Clearly Parliament considered that it was only fair that if this measure was to be introduced to save possibly vast sums of money to the highway authority in future, private individuals should recover fair and reasonable compensation for the injurious effect caused to their property by the improvement line. This compensation was payable on the improvement line being prescribed.

- A Reference has been made to the possibility of differences of opinion between the planning authority and the highway authority and to the possibility that even if they agreed and a line were prescribed by the highway authority, the adjoining owners might successfully appeal to quarter sessions. DIPLOCK, L.J., has pointed out that town and country planning is intimately concerned, amongst other things, with the lay-out of highways, and therefore in exercising the powers
- B conferred under s. 17 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1962, one of the material considerations to take into account is highways. I respectfully agree. I can imagine cases in which it would be a reasonable exercise of the power under s. 17 to refuse planning permission if, for example, quarter sessions had allowed an appeal in respect of an improvement line prescribed by the highway authority and approved by the planning authority. It seems to me, however,
- C that this is rather unlikely to occur; it would be a capricious decision of quarter sessions, and, on a case stated, would be unlikely to survive. Again, it is possible, although unlikely, that there might be a dispute between the planning authority and the highway authority. The planning authority might decide on a road widening scheme to which the highway authority would not agree and for which it would refuse to prescribe an improvement line. No doubt, in such a case, the
- D matter would be referred to the Ministries concerned. In the still more unlikely event of the Ministries failing to agree what the line of the new road should be, the planning authority might properly refuse planning permission to erect any building which projected beyond the line of their proposed road widening in spite of the fact that no improvement line had been prescribed by the highway authority. We are not, however, in this case dealing with circumstances even
- E remotely resembling such as these. The Lairgate road widening scheme had evidently been decided on by the Ministry of Transport and the highway authority. The question here is whether it is a proper exercise of the power conferred on the planning authority under s. 17 to refuse planning permission solely in order to save the highway authority money. Put in a slightly different way, is the planning authority entitled by a side wind to prescribe an improvement line so as to deprive
- F the individual property owner of compensation for the damage which he thereby suffers and which Parliament in the Highways Acts clearly intended him to recover?

In this case, as I hope to demonstrate, it seems to me that there is not the slightest doubt but that the only reason why planning permission was refused was to save the highway authority the expense of prescribing an improvement

- G line. Incidentally, the planning authority is here the same body as the highway authority. LORD DENNING, in the case (17) to which DIPLOCK, L.J., has referred, has said that it is an improper use or abuse of power if a power given by Parliament for one object is used for an object for which it is not intended to be used, i.e., if the power is used for some ulterior motive. I do not think that Parliament gave the planning authority power under the Town and Country Planning Acts
- H to enable the planning authority to save the highway authority money by depriving the citizen of the compensation accorded him by the Highways Acts.

The other way in which the point was put was by LORD GREENE, M.R., in Associated Provincial Picture Houses, Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corpn. (18). He said:

- I "... it may still be possible to say that the local authority . . . have come to a conclusion so unreasonable that no reasonable authority could ever come to it. In such a case, again, I think the court can interfere."

In my view if a local authority decides to refuse permission under s. 17 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1962, in order to save the highway authority money by depriving the citizen of compensation which Parliament intends him to have, that conclusion is so unreasonable that no reasonable authority ought to come to it.

The first time the bank made an application for permission to build its strong room on its land which abutted on Lairgate was on Apr. 1, 1962, and that was refused on these grounds: A

“ The proposed development might prejudice the possible future widening of Lairgate which it is intended should have an ultimate overall width of forty feet.” B

The bank then went away and thought whether it could build its strong room on some other part of its premises. It came to the conclusion that this could not be done effectively or economically. So it renewed its application in March, 1964. That application was again refused by the planning authority, and the bank accordingly appealed to the Minister. The Minister instructed an inspector, Mr. Deans, to carry out an inquiry, which he did in March of 1965; and he reported on Apr. 22, 1965. He recommended that the bank's appeal should be allowed, and his conclusion was that for “ twenty years the council have, through planning control, protected a scheme for the widening of Lairgate along its eastern side ”; he concluded that it was quite uncertain whether or when Lairgate would be widened. Whilst that finding stood, it would I suppose have been quite impossible for any civil servant in the Ministry of Housing to dismiss the appeal and refuse to accept the report of the inspector. C D

I pause here to observe that for twenty years the land abutting the eastern line of Lairgate had been sterilised under the Town and Country Planning Acts. After that report, there was complete silence for very nearly one whole year. This, however, does not mean that nothing was occurring. There were clearly consultations going on between the civil servants in the Ministry of Housing and in the Ministry of Transport. This appears from the decision letter to the bank dated Mar. 10, 1966. After referring to the inspector's report, as to which the bank had had no information at all for eleven months, the letter states: E

“ The Minister [the Minister of Housing] has however been advised by the Minister of Transport that—the future widening of Lairgate is a firm proposal which is part of a long-term road improvement scheme essential for the relief of traffic congestion in Beverley. The appeal site will definitely be required for the widening of Lairgate and whilst there are no plans for the immediate implementation of this proposal it is essential that it should not be prejudiced by the development of land which will be needed for the road widening ’.” F

This means that the decision to widen Lairgate was the decision of the highways authority approved by the Ministry of Transport. The letter then goes on to say that the Minister of Housing does not propose to allow the appeal, but, if the bank desire it, he will re-open the inquiry before coming to a final decision. G

It is not difficult to imagine the consternation that must have prevailed amongst those employed in the Ministry of Transport when the report of Mr. Deans was drawn to their attention. If the report were allowed to stand, clearly there was a real danger that the scheme, which had been devised in 1954 and which had worked well since, for depriving property owners of the compensation provided for them by the Highways Acts might go awry. It was no doubt appreciated that unless the highway authority used their statutory powers to prescribe an improvement line (which they had avoided doing for years) and paid some compensation to the property owners for the damage they had suffered thereby, it might be that the land beyond the line would be developed and that accordingly when, if ever, the road came to be widened, the expense would be greatly increased. H I

The judge drew attention to a circular (19) which had been issued by the Ministry of Transport in 1954, No. 696, which appeared to him, and I must say appears to me, to be significant. Paragraph 8 is in these terms:

- A "Prescription of Building and Improvement Lines. In view of the powers now available to local authorities as planning authorities for the control of development it is no longer necessary for councils to safeguard future road improvement scheme by using their powers under s. 5 of the Road Improvement Act, 1925, or s. 33 of the Public Health Act, 1925 [these are the pre-cursors of s. 72 of the Act of 1959] to prescribe building and improvement
- B lines. Accordingly the Minister will no longer entertain applications for grants in respect of expenditure incurred by councils in meeting claims for compensation payable in consequence of the prescription of building and improvement lines."

- C That seems to me to be saying quite plainly, although in a style not unfamiliar to such documents: "You would be very stupid to prescribe an improvement line under the Highways Acts, because that will involve you in paying the compensation to property owners which Parliament has given them for the damage which they may suffer by such a line being prescribed. In the past, of course, you have been able to rely on getting the money back, or a large part of it, from the central government; but you can by-pass the Highways Acts and treat them as a
- D dead letter, because you can rely on the planning authority in fact to impose an improvement line by refusing planning permission; that will deprive the property owners of any of their rights to compensation, and you are just throwing money away which you will not get back from us if you prescribe the line under the Highways Acts." Ever since that circular was published it appears that, perhaps not unnaturally, improvement lines have not been prescribed under the
- E Highways Acts, and planning powers have been used to sterilise land for road widening purposes without paying the property owners any compensation.

- The bank said that it would like the inquiry re-opened, and it was; but the Ministry did not select the same inspector who was familiar with the case and had taken all the evidence previously given. He may not have been available: one does not know. Another inspector was selected, and he held an inquiry, the
- F second inquiry, in November, 1966. The borough council, in the evidence which it filed, said:

- "In recent years any proposals for development within the improvement line have been resisted. Consequently several building proposals have not been carried out and others have been amended so as to stand behind the improvement line."

- G Now, this had been going on apparently for twenty years, and it is quite obvious from what the borough council have said themselves that in their capacity of planning authority, they did impose an improvement line; and it is equally obvious, if you correlate the evidence which they gave with the circular of the Ministry to which I have referred, that this was done with the sole purpose of
- H saving themselves money as the highway authority and depriving private citizens of compensation.

Mr. Jackson, who was the second inspector, eventually made a report, and the final conclusion he came to was this:

- "It seems possible that, following the realisation of other road proposals in the central area, the increased use of Lairgate would then make it
- I essential for the widening to be carried out within the foreseeable future."

I draw attention to the words "It seems possible", not "likely" or "probable", but "possible"—that it might be necessary to widen Lairgate after the other work had been done. When? "In the foreseeable future." That is a very nebulous term. It might mean three, ten, twenty, thirty, forty years. Who knows? Apparently from the evidence more than twenty years ago planning permission had been refused because of the possible widening of Lairgate at some indefinite future time. Following on that second inspector's report, a decision letter was written to the bank on Jan. 31, 1967—the relevant parts of which have been read, and which I need not repeat—dismissing the appeal. A

Parliament has clearly manifested its intention in the Highways Acts that if a highway authority is to protect itself from having to pay an enhanced value for land subsequently to be taken over for a road widening, it should do so by prescribing an improvement line so as to prevent the land being developed meanwhile, but that if it does so, it should do what would seem to the ordinary man to be fair and reasonable, namely, compensate the individuals who own the property concerned against the damage that their property will suffer as a result of that line having been prescribed. I for my part deplore the practice that appears to have grown up of using planning powers—the necessarily wide planning powers that were conferred by the Town and Country Planning Acts—for the purpose of defeating the manifest intention of Parliament expressed in the Highways Acts. The Highways Acts seem to me to prescribe the regular method to be adopted by the highway authorities if they wish to protect themselves against the extra expense to which I have referred. In this connexion I would cite two short passages from the judgments in Hall & Co., Ltd. v. Shoreham-by-Sea Urban District Council (20). The facts in that case were no doubt very different. That was a case where planning permission was granted under s. 14 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, which was the precursor of s. 17 of the Act of 1962, on condition that the applicants constructed a road. No one doubts that from a planning point of view the construction of this road was quite excellent, and under s. 14, just as under s. 17, there were the widest powers to grant permission on conditions. From a planning point of view the condition imposed could not have been better; but, for the reasons explained in the judgment, the imposition of this condition was extremely hard on the applicants and the planning authority could have provided for the building of the road in a regular way under the statute without imposing any hardship on the applicants. E
WILLMER, L.J., speaking about the condition, said (21):

“The defendants would thus obtain the benefit of having the road constructed for them at the plaintiffs’ expense, on the plaintiffs’ land, and without the necessity for paying any compensation in respect thereof. Bearing in mind that another and more regular course is open to the defendants it seems to me that this result would be utterly unreasonable and such as Parliament cannot possibly have intended.” F

PEARSON, L.J., said (22):

“I should, however, be inclined to say that the element of ultra vires is to be found in the conflict with the general law relating to highways. The general words of s. 14 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, should not be interpreted as authorising a radical departure from the general law relating to highways.” G

It seems to me that those passages are particularly applicable in the present case. In my judgment the general words of s. 17 should not be applied so as radically to depart from the procedure which is laid down in the law applicable to highways under s. 72 of the Highways Act, 1959. The judge came to the conclusion—and I entirely agree with him—that the reason for adopting these methods was purely economic. To adopt the regular method of prescribing an improvement line would not prejudice the construction of the road in any sense except that it would cost the highway authority more money than this radical departure from the general law relating to highways, namely, it would cost them the price of paying the landowners compensation for the damage which they might suffer by reason of the imposition or prescription of the improvement line. I do not think it matters much which way it is put, whether one says that what was done amounted to a use or abuse of power to which no reasonable authority should be a party, H I

- A or whether it is said, in LORD DENNING's phrase, that it was done for an ulterior motive, or whether it is described as an entire departure from the regular practice laid down under the Highways Act, 1959: it seems to me that it is quite unjustifiable in law. It was done solely to save the highway authority money by depriving the citizen of his statutory rights to compensation. I do not believe the powers under the Town and Country Planning Acts were ever designed to be used for that purpose.

B For my part, I unhesitatingly agree with the decision of the judge (23) and I would accordingly dismiss the appeal.

D OFFICIAL REFEREES.

Practice—Reference to referee—Procedure—Hearing of first summons—Delivery of pleadings—Solicitors to be ready to state nature of claim and defence—Directions and orders by referee—Date for trial of action—Expert evidence.

- E 1. At the time of the issue of the first summons before the Official Referee, a copy of all the pleadings, including particulars, already served should be lodged with his clerk so that they can be considered by the Official Referee before the hearing of the summons. Such copy of the pleadings may be collected from the clerk to the Official Referee for the purpose of preparing a bound copy of the pleadings for use at the trial.

- F 2. At the hearing of the first summons before the Official Referee, the solicitors of the parties or their London agents should be in the position to state the nature of the claim and of the defence. Failure in this respect may result in unnecessary adjournments with attendant costs.

- G 3. At the hearing of the first summons before him, the Official Referee will give the necessary directions and make the necessary orders regarding the steps in the action to be taken by the parties. It is of the utmost importance that these steps should be taken within the time-limits set by the direction or order, so that the practice of giving a fixed date for the trial may be continued.

- H 4. Once an action has been given a fixed date for trial, no alteration will be granted except with the leave of the Official Referee which will be granted only in exceptional circumstances. If a fixed date for trial is vacated, the fresh date for trial may not be a fixed date.

- I 5. Where a party intends to adduce expert evidence, he should produce to the other party his expert's statement of proposed evidence, together with any reports, plans, models, calculations, etc., relevant to it, for agreement if possible. Failing such agreement, the other party should deliver to the first party a written statement setting out particulars of the matters not agreed. Where both parties intend to adduce expert evidence, each should follow this procedure. Failure by any party to follow this procedure may result in a special order as to costs.

CHAPMAN v. EARL. CHAPMAN v. WEEKES.

R. v. BRISTOL RENT ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE, Ex parte EARL.
SAME v. WEEKES.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Parker, C.J., Waller and Fisher, J.J.), May 17, 30, 1968.]

Rent Restriction—Rent—Regulated tenancy—Determination of fair rent—Application—Failure to specify amount of rent sought to be registered—Whether fatal defect rendering application a nullity—Rent Act 1965 (c. 75) s. 26 (5), Sch. 3, para. 2—Rent Regulation (Forms, etc.) (England and Wales) Regulations 1965, S.I. 1965 No. 1976, reg. 7, Sch. 3, Form 4, para. 9.

Failure by an applicant for registration of a rent for a dwelling-house under s. 26 of, and Sch. 3 to, the Rent Act 1965 to specify in his application the rent which it is sought to register is a fatal defect, having the consequence that the application and subsequent proceedings on it are a nullity and that certiorari lies to quash the determination of the rent pursuant to such an application; for the requirement in para. 2* of Sch. 3 to the Act of 1965 that the application "must" contain the prescribed particulars in addition to the rent which it is sought to register is, on the true construction of that Schedule, an imperative requirement (see p. 1218, letter I, and p. 1219, letter H, post).

Principle of construction stated by LORD PENZANCE in Howard v. Bodington ((1877), 2 P.D. at pp. 210, 211) applied.

Vickers, Sons & Co. v. Siddell ((1890), 15 App. Cas. 496) and Francis Jackson Developments, Ltd. v. Hall ([1951] 2 All E.R. 74) distinguished.

Accordingly, where a tenant made application for registration of a rent for the ground floor flat of which he was tenant and, instead of stating in para. 9 of the prescribed form of application the amount of the rent sought to be registered, stated "rent officer to determine fair rent", the subsequent determination of a fair rent by the rent assessment committee, on the landlord's objection to the rent officer's determination, was quashed on application for certiorari; though the remedy of certiorari, being discretionary, was granted as a matter of the court's discretion in view of special circumstances of the particular case (Chapman v. Earl, see p. 1220, letter I, to p. 1221, letter B, post).

Appeals and applications for certiorari.

These were initially two appeals brought under s. 9 of the Tribunals and Inquiries Act, 1958, as applied by the Tribunal and Inquiries (Rent Assessment Committees) Order 1965, by the appellant, Joseph Henry Chapman, against determinations made by the Bristol Rent Assessment Committee on Nov. 14, * Paragraph 2 is set out at p. 1218, letter G, post.

- A 1967, under the Rent Act 1965, in respect of two flats at 13, Davis Street, Avonmouth, Bristol of which the appellant was landlord, and of which the respondents Roger John Earl and Jean P. Weekes were the tenants of the basement* and first floor flats respectively. The grounds of appeal in each case was the same, viz., that the applications made to the rent officer for the registration of a rent of the respective flats were not made in the manner prescribed, in that contrary to para. 2 of Sch. 3 to the Rent Act 1965, and reg. 7 of the Rent Regulation (Forms, etc.) (England and Wales) Regulations 1965† the applications did not state the amount of the rent which it was sought in each case to register, and that in consequence in the purported determinations of the rent officer the reference to the rent assessment committee and its determination were made without jurisdiction and were nullities. At the hearing of the appeals on May 17, 1968, it appeared to the court that the remedy, if any, was by way of order of certiorari and not by way of appeal. Accordingly, counsel for the appellant was given leave to move for certiorari to quash the decisions of the Bristol Rent Assessment Committee dated Nov. 14, 1967, that (a) in respect of the respondent Earl a fair rent for the ground floor basement flat was £169 per annum excluding rate; and (b) in respect of the respondent Weekes a fair rent for the first floor flat was £156 per annum excluding rates.

The cases noted below‡ were cited during the argument in addition to those referred to in the judgment of the court.

FISHER, J., at the invitation of LORD PARKER, C.J., read the judgment of the court, in which, after stating the nature of the appeals and the granting of leave to move for orders of certiorari he continued:] the relevant facts are these—

- F 1. Chapman v. Earl. The respondent became tenant of the basement flat at 13 Davis Street (of which the appellant is the landlord) on Mar. 27, 1967, at a rent of £5 10s. per week inclusive. On Aug. 10, 1967, he completed and submitted to the rent officer an application for registration of fair rent. He states in his affidavit that he filled it in with the help of an assistant to the rent officer. The application was on the prescribed form, but in para. 9 instead of filling in the rent proposed to be registered the respondent simply wrote "Rent Officer to determine Fair Rent". On Aug. 11 the rent officer sent a copy of the application to the appellant with a letter telling him that he was entitled to make representations to him in writing "against the rent specified in para. 8 of the application", and asking for them by Aug. 21. A reply was sent on Aug. 14 by agents of the appellant saying that the respondent in March, 1967, had signed a statement that the rent was reasonable. On Sept. 4 the rent officer invited both appellant and respondent to a discussion with him on Sept. 11 at the premises. This duly took place, although the appellant complains that he was not allowed to say anything at the discussion. Thereafter on Sept. 14, the rent officer made and communicated to the parties a determination that the fair rent was £2 15s. per week exclusive. At no time up till then had the appellant suggested that the application was defective. On Sept. 28 the appellant's agents wrote to the rent officer objecting

* The flat was described as basement flat in the application for determination of rent and as ground floor flat in the application for certiorari and in the determination of the rent assessment committee.

to his determination, and the rent officer accordingly referred the matter to the rent assessment committee. Written representations were made by both parties; the committee inspected the premises, and at the request of the appellant a hearing took place on Nov. 13. The committee then on Nov. 14 made and communicated to the parties their determination that the fair rent was £169 per annum exclusive. This rent has been registered under the Act of 1965, as the fair rent of the premises. At the hearing before the committee the appellant (who conducted his own case) asked the respondent what rent he had put down on the application form and what he thought was a fair rent, to which the respondent replied that he had not put down any rent but had left the matter to the discretion of the rent officer; the appellant did not suggest that he had been prejudiced, or suggest that the committee should not proceed with the reference, but he says that he did not appreciate that an objection to the jurisdiction should be made at the start of the hearing, that he had intended to make an objection at the conclusion of the evidence, but that he was not then given any opportunity to say anything.

2. Chapman v. Weekes. The respondent became tenant of the first floor flat at 13, Davis Street on Apr. 3, 1967, at a rent of £5 per week inclusive. Her application was dated Aug. 19, and what she wrote in para. 9 of the form was "£5 per week appears to be excessive, but cannot suggest rent as rates not known". A copy of this application was sent to the appellant, with an invitation to make representations, but none having been made the rent officer on Sept. 18 made and communicated to the parties a determination that the fair rent was £2 10s. per week exclusive. Objection was made on behalf of the appellant and the matter was referred to the rent assessment committee. Written representations were made, the premises were inspected and on Nov. 13 there was a hearing, following which the committee determined the fair rent at £156 per annum exclusive. There is no evidence that any point as to jurisdiction was taken by the appellant at any stage. Paragraph 2 of Sch. 3 to the Act of 1965 provides that an application for the registration of a rent for a dwelling-house must be in the prescribed form and contain the prescribed particulars in addition to the rent which it is sought to register. There is no doubt that these applications did not contain the rent which it was sought to register. What is the consequence of that omission? Does it render the application and the subsequent proceedings void? Can the requirements that the proposed rent should be stated be waived by the other party? If it can, then it seems to the court that the failure by the appellant to make an objection as soon as he received copies of the applications, and his subsequent participation in the proceedings, might possibly amount to a waiver. If, however, the requirement is mandatory, and goes to the jurisdiction, it cannot be waived and the omission is fatal to the validity of the proceedings.

The question whether procedural requirements are mandatory, or are merely directory and open to waiver, has arisen many times under different statutes dealing with a variety of subjects. Counsel for the respondent Earl cited a number of cases, and many more on both sides of the line are referred to in MAXWELL (1). The true position is that stated by LORD PENZANCE in Howard v. Bodington (2). He said this:

"Now the distinction between matters that are directory and matters that are imperative is well known to us all in the common language of the courts at Westminster . . . Since the matter was argued I have been very carefully through [these cases], but upon reading them all the conclusion at which I am constrained to arrive is, that you cannot glean a great deal that is very decisive from a perusal of [the cases]. They are on all sorts of subjects. It is very difficult to group them together, and the tendency of my mind, after reading them, is to come to the conclusion which was expressed by

- A LORD CAMPBELL in the case of the Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (3). LORD CAMPBELL was then sitting as Lord Chancellor. In an appeal from the Vice-Chancellor, and in giving judgment, his lordship said this (4): 'No universal rule can be laid down for the construction of statutes, as to whether mandatory enactments shall be considered directory only or obligatory, with an implied nullification for disobedience. It is the duty of courts of justice
- B to try to get at the real intention of the legislature by carefully attending to the whole scope of the statute to be construed'."

Part 2 of the Act of 1965 provides for the appointment of rent officers pursuant to schemes made by the Minister for registration areas, and for the constitution of rent assessment committees. Section 26 of the Act provides:

- C " (1) The rent officer for any area shall prepare and keep up to date a register for the purposes of this Act and shall make the register available for inspection in such place or places and in such manner as may be provided by the scheme made for the area under this Part of this Act or, in Scotland, as the Secretary of State may direct. (2) The register shall contain, in addition to the rent payable under a regulated tenancy of a dwelling-house—
- D (a) the prescribed particulars with regard to the tenancy; and (b) a specification of the dwelling-house."

Subsection (3) provides for copies of an entry in the register certified under the hand of the rent officer or any person duly authorised by him to be receivable in evidence. Subsection (4) provides for persons to be entitled to obtain copies on payment of a fee, and sub-s. (5) reads as follows:

- E " Schedule 3 to this Act shall have effect with respect to applications for the registration of rents and the procedure to be followed on such applications and Sch. 4 to this Act shall have effect with respect to certificates of fair rent."

Section 27 and s. 28 deal respectively with the determination of fair rent and the amount to be registered as rent, but the only provisions which deal with the question how a fair rent is to be determined, as a preliminary to registration,

F are to be found in Sch. 3. The registration of a rent has an important effect on the rights of the parties, since by virtue of s. 3 and s. 7 of the Act of 1965, whatever the contractual rent may be, any excess over the registered rent is irrecoverable from the tenant. We propose to look first at paras. 5 to 8 of Sch. 3. They read as follows:

- G " 5. Where the application is made by the landlord alone the rent officer shall serve on the tenant, and where it is made by the tenant alone he shall serve on the landlord, a notice informing him of the application and specifying a period, not less than seven days from the service of the notice, during which representations in writing may be made to the rent officer against the registration of the rent specified in the application.

- H " 6. Where—(a) the application is made jointly by the landlord and the tenant, or (b) no representations are made as mentioned in the preceding paragraph, and it appears to the rent officer, after making such inquiry, if any, as he thinks fit and considering any information supplied to him in pursuance of para. 4 of this Schedule, that the rent specified in the application is a fair rent, he may register that rent without further proceedings, and if he does so he shall notify the landlord and the tenant accordingly.

- I " 7. Where representations are made as mentioned in para. 5 of this schedule or the rent officer is not satisfied that the rent specified in the application is a fair rent (or that the rent for the time being registered is no longer a fair rent) he shall serve a notice on the landlord and on the tenant informing him that he proposes, at a time (which shall not be earlier than seven days after the service of the notice) and place specified in the notice to consider in consultation with the landlord and the tenant, or such of them as may appear at that time and place, what rent ought to be registered for the dwelling-house or, as the case may be, whether a different rent ought to be registered; and at any such consultation the landlord and tenant may each be represented by a person authorised by him in that behalf, whether or not that person is of counsel or a solicitor.

"8. After considering, in accordance with the preceding paragraph, what rent ought to be registered or, as the case may be, whether a different rent ought to be registered, the rent officer shall, as the case may require—
(a) determine a fair rent and register it as the rent for the dwelling-house; or
(b) confirm the rent for the time being registered and note the confirmation in the register . . ."

Then there is provision for notification of his determination and for reference to a rent assessment committee if either party has any objection.

The jurisdiction of the rent officer to deal with applications and to determine and register rents is conferred by these paragraphs, and is limited to the jurisdiction thereby conferred. It is in our judgment clear from these paragraphs that he is empowered only to deal with applications in which a proposed rent is specified, and that his power to determine and to register can be exercised only in reference to such an application. The procedure set out in paras. 5 to 8 could not be operated in relation to an application which did not contain a proposed rent. Look first at para. 5. The notice which has to be given is to offer an opportunity to make representations against the registration of the rent specified in the application. Then para. 6. The power of the rent officer to register without more ado if no representations are made could not be exercised if no rent was specified. The consideration in consultation provided for by para. 7 can take place only if representations are made as mentioned in para. 5 (that is against the rent specified in the application), or if the rent officer is not satisfied that the rent specified in the application is a fair rent. The power to determine and register a rent under para. 8 can be exercised only after consideration in accordance with para. 7. In the light of these provisions we turn back to paras. 1 and 2 of Sch. 3 which reads as follows:

"1. An application for the registration of a rent for a dwelling-house may be made to the rent officer by the landlord or the tenant, or jointly by the landlord and the tenant, under a regulated tenancy of the dwelling-house.

"2. Any such application must be in the prescribed form and contain the prescribed particulars in addition to the rent which it is sought to register."

It seems to us that the specification in the application of a particular rent is fundamental to the whole scheme of Sch. 3. Paragraph 2 does not merely treat the proposed rent as one of the prescribed particulars (although it is in fact included among the particulars prescribed by the Rent Regulation (Forms, etc.) (England and Wales) Regulations 1965 (5)). The prescribed particulars are to be given "in addition to the rent which it is sought to register". Paragraph 2 is drafted as if this was something which had already been dealt with, and we think that it had. In our judgment, when para. 1 speaks of "an application for the registration of a rent for a dwelling-house", it does not mean an application at large, but an application for the registration of a particular rent. We consider, therefore, that failure to specify a rent in an application under this Schedule is a fatal defect, that the defect cannot be waived and that it renders the application and all subsequent proceedings on it a nullity. It was urged on us that the courts have been reluctant to treat a non-compliance with a procedural requirement as invalidating the whole proceedings and incapable of waiver. There are undoubtedly many instances where such requirements have been treated as merely directory where the word "shall" is used in the statute. Only one case has been brought

A to our attention where this course has been followed when the word in the statute was "must".

In Vickers Sons and Co. v. Siddell (6), the question arose under s. 5 of the Patents Designs and Trade Marks Act, 1883, which provided as follows:

B " (1) An application for a patent must be made in the form set forth in Sch. 1 to this Act, or in such other form as may be from time to time prescribed; and must be left at, or sent by post to, the patent office in the prescribed manner. (2) An application must contain a declaration to the effect that the applicant is in possession of an invention . . . (5) A specification, whether provisional or complete, must commence with the title . . . "

In Vickers, Sons and Co. v. Siddell, LORD HALSBURY, L.C., said (7):

C "The objection that no distinct claim is made, is one of form only, and I think the legislature did not intend to make the direction, which undoubtedly the Act contains, a condition upon the non-compliance with which the patent should be void. There is no trace of any such intention in the statute, and there does not seem any good reason why it should be inferred from the general policy of the statute. On the contrary, the questions of mere form, I think, were intended to be dealt with under the new machinery provided."

D LORD HERSCHELL, with whom LORD MORRIS concurred, said (8):

E "The last objection taken to the patent is, that the complete specification does not 'end with a distinct statement of the invention claimed', as required by s. 5 (5) of the Act. The Act does not provide that if this requirement is not complied with the patent shall be void, and I think it is impossible to imply any such condition. There is no more warrant for doing so in this case than in the case of non-compliance with any other of the provisions of the section. The provision which immediately precedes that in question requires that a specification should 'commence with the title'. It could hardly be gravely contended that if the comptroller accepted a specification where the title did not occupy the first place the patent granted ought on that account to be held void."

F It was strongly pressed on us by counsel, who appeared on the instructions of the assessment committee to assist the court, that it would be equally absurd and destructive of the intention of Parliament if the omission or misstatement of any one of the prescribed particulars invalidated the whole proceedings; and that, if the word "must" is to be treated as directory in relation to any part of the subject matter of para. 2 of Sch. 3, it must be directory in relation to all parts including the proposed rent. This argument would be stronger if para. 2 stood by itself, and if instead of being specially mentioned the proposed rent were merely one of the prescribed particulars. We consider that para. 1 of the Schedule, read with paras. 2 and 5 to 8, makes the statement of the proposed rent an essential condition to the exercise by the rent officer of his powers. We do not find it necessary to decide whether the omission or misstatement of any of the prescribed particulars would render the application a nullity; but even if the right view were that it would not, that would not invalidate the conclusion which we have reached about the effect of the omission of the proposed rent.

H Counsel further argued that the essential thing is the determination by the rent officer: that, whatever the application may say or not say, nothing can be registered without an independent judgment as to the fair rent being formed by the rent officer; and that the application is merely a non-essential preliminary to this act of judgment. As a description of the procedure that is correct, and it would not have been surprising if Parliament had permitted applications at large and left it to the rent officer to form his own judgment without reference to any particular figure; but this has not been done. The words of the schedule are too strong to permit of such an interpretation. The power to determine is a conditional one, one of the conditions being an application for a specified rent. One good reason for that is that it gives the other party a target for his representations which he would otherwise lack. In Francis Jackson Developments, Ltd. v. Hall (9), the Court of Appeal had to deal with a case under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949. DENNING, L.J., said (10):

"[Counsel for the defendants] put his argument in two ways. The first contention . . . was that on Dec. 13, 1950, Sergeant Perkins was a trespasser. He said that the application by Sergeant Perkins to the rent tribunal on Dec. 7, 1950, was a nullity, because it named Mrs. Hall as the landlord instead of Mrs. Tagg. He said that every tenant who applies to a rent tribunal for security of tenure must, at his peril, comply with all the regulations made by the Minister of Health under the provisions of the Act of 1949, and, in particular, the tenant must specify the name and address of the landlord and all other matters which are set out in the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Regulations, 1949 (11), reg. 3 (2), as amended by the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) (Amendment) Regulations, 1950 (12), reg. 2. If the tenant failed to specify in his application any of the matters required by the regulations, as, for instance, if he failed to specify the name of the landlord or his address or specified them wrongly, counsel contended that the application would be a nullity and the tenant would not have the security of tenure given by s. 11 (2) (a) of the Act of 1949. We cannot accept that contention . . . The Act of Parliament does not require an application to a rent tribunal to be in any prescribed form. It contemplates that applications under the Act will often be made by tenants who have no lawyers to advise them and no regulations by their side; and for this very reason it does not prescribe any formalities. It gives the Minister power to make regulations with regard to proceedings before rent tribunals, and that, no doubt, includes power to give directions as to the form which applications should take, but the Minister has no power to impose formal conditions of validity on an application, when Parliament itself has required none. The regulations must, therefore, be construed as directory and not imperative, for otherwise the Minister would be exceeding his powers."

The Act of 1965 is in very different terms from the Act of 1949, and in our judgment Parliament does, at any rate in regard to the proposed rent, require applications to be in a particular form. We have naturally considered the practical consequences of the judgment which we are now giving. We do not believe that practical inconvenience will follow. Rent officers will of course refuse to accept applications in which the proposed rent is not specified. Tenants making applications will be well advised, if they are uncertain what figure to put in, to err on the low side, and landlords on the high.

It remains for us to consider what if any relief to afford to the appellant. We are satisfied that the appeals are misconceived, and that relief cannot be given to him except by way of certiorari. Certiorari is a discretionary remedy, and we are not sure that, applying the principles laid down by LORD GREENE, M.R., in R. v. Stafford Justices, Ex p. Stafford Corpn. (13) we ought not to refuse him that relief. The point which he has taken is a technical one and he has been in no way prejudiced. On the other hand he does complain that he was not allowed to speak to the rent officer at the meeting at the time of the inspection on Sept. 11, and he does say he intended to make an objection at the hearing before the committee at the end of the evidence. In view of these special circumstances,

INTRODUCTIONS, LTD. v. NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK, LTD.

D Company—Memorandum of association—Object clauses—Construction—Borrowing power declared as an object—Provision that objects were independent objects—Company's business changed and new business ultra vires—Money borrowed from bank, to which copy of memorandum was supplied—Whether borrowing power capable of being an independent object—Whether the borrowing from the bank was ultra vires.

E The plaintiff company was incorporated in March, 1951, for the purpose of offering services and information to visitors from overseas in connexion with the Festival of Britain and thereafter to visiting business men generally. The company's memorandum of association contained an assembly of diverse objects and powers and ended with a clause declaring that each preceding sub-clause should be construed independently of and should be in no way linked by reference to any other sub-clause, and that the objects set out in each sub-clause were independent objects of the company. Sub-clause (N) enabled the company to borrow or raise money in such manner as it thought fit. From 1951 to 1953 the company provided accommodation and services for visitors from abroad. From 1953 to 1958 its only business was the provision of deckchairs and amusement machines at a south coast resort. F In November, 1958, 398 of the four hundred issued shares changed hands and there was a complete change in the board of directors. In November, 1960, the company began pig-breeding as its only business. In December, 1960, the company borrowed money on the security of debentures from its bankers, the defendant bank, the bank being fully aware that the only business carried on by the company was pig-breeding and that the objects for which the company was formed were those set out in its memorandum of association of which the bank had a copy. At a time when the company was substantially indebted to the bank it was put into compulsory liquidation. On the question whether the borrowing from the bank was intra vires the company,

H Held: (i) on the true construction of the memorandum and articles of association of the company the carrying on of the business of pig-breeding, as the sole business of the company, was ultra vires the company (see p. 1225, letter C, post).

I (ii) on the true construction of sub-cl. (N) of the memorandum of association (which was a sub-clause that was incapable of being a wholly independent object, notwithstanding the final provision in the memorandum declaring all the objects to be independent) the power of borrowing that sub-cl. (N) conferred was the power to borrow for the legitimate purposes of the company, and, as the borrowing from the bank was for a purpose that was ultra vires, viz., carrying on the business of pig-breeding, the borrowing

(and thus the creation of the debentures) was ultra vires (see p. 1227, letter H, and p. 1228, letter D, post). A

Adjourned Summons.

This was an application by originating summons dated Jan. 26, 1968, by the plaintiff, Introductions, Ltd., for the determination by the court of the following questions—(i) whether on the true construction of the memorandum and articles of association of the plaintiff company, the carrying on of the business of pig-breeders as its sole business was intra vires the plaintiff company, and (ii) whether on the true construction of the memorandum and articles of association of the plaintiff company and in the events which happened, the borrowing by the plaintiff company from the defendant National Provincial Bank, Ltd., was intra vires the plaintiff company. The facts are set out in the judgment. D

L. J. M. Smith for the defendant bank.

BUCKLEY, J.: The plaintiff company, Introductions, Ltd., which is now in liquidation, was incorporated in March, 1951, and the intention of those who formed the company was that it should be used to offer services and information to overseas visitors in connexion with the Festival of Britain, and after the end of the festival that it should be used to give services and information to visiting business men generally. F

From 1951 to 1953 the plaintiff company in fact provided accommodation, goods and services for visitors from abroad during their stay in London or elsewhere in this country. From 1953 to 1958 its only business was the provision of deckchairs and coin-operated amusement machines at a south coast resort. Between 1958 and 1960 the plaintiff company carried on no business. In November, 1958, 398 of the four hundred issued shares of the plaintiff company changed hands and there was a complete change in the personnel composing the board of directors of the company. In November, 1960, the plaintiff company embarked on a new business, and from that time until its liquidation the only business of the plaintiff company was that of pig-farming. The plaintiff company carried on that business under the trade name of "Anglian Pig Breeders" and adopted a rather complicated arrangement into the details of which I need not go, but it was an arrangement under which members of the public were invited to contribute moneys, which were invested, on their behalf, by the plaintiff company in the purchase, for the contributor, of one of the plaintiff company's breeding sows; in due course, the plaintiff company bought back from that G

A contributor the progeny of the sow in question. The scheme was not financially successful and, in due course, the plaintiff company was put into liquidation under an order of the court.

In December, 1960, the plaintiff company, through its managing director, approached the defendant bank with a view to opening an account at the bank and, in January, 1961, appropriate resolutions were passed by the board for the opening of such an account. Thereafter, the plaintiff company kept its account with the defendant bank and created certain debentures in favour of the bank for securing its indebtedness to the bank. At the time of the liquidation of the plaintiff company it was indebted to the bank in a substantial sum. The questions raised in this summons are directed to determining whether the loans made by the bank to the plaintiff company are loans which the bank can recover, whether the bank is entitled to enforce its security under the debentures. It is not in dispute that at all material times the bank was fully aware, first, that the only business which the plaintiff company was carrying on was that of pig-breeders and, secondly, that the objects for which the plaintiff company was formed were those set out in its memorandum of association, with a copy of which the bank had been provided. The originating summons asks two questions: (i) whether, on the true construction of the memorandum and articles of association of the plaintiff company, the carrying on of the business of pig breeders as its sole business was intra vires the plaintiff company; (ii) whether, on the true construction of the memorandum and articles of association of the plaintiff company and in the events which have happened, the borrowing by the plaintiff company from the bank was intra vires the plaintiff company.

E I must, therefore, look at the memorandum of association of the plaintiff company to ascertain on what activities it could, properly, embark within the powers conferred on it by that document. This memorandum of association is framed in accordance with the practice which was very severely criticised in the House of Lords in Cotman v. Brougham (1), whereby the draftsman assembles a number of objects or powers about as diverse in their character as the topics of conversation proposed by the walrus to the carpenter (2), but in many a case much more numerous, and then, for good measure, adds, at the end, a clause to the effect that each paragraph of the objects clause shall be construed independently and shall be treated as an independent object of the company.

It is common ground that the main objects of the plaintiff company—if it be right to look for main objects in such a memorandum of association—are to be found in the first four sub-clauses of the objects clause, which are as follows:

H “(A) To promote, organise and provide entertainments and services for overseas and other visitors: to act as secretary to, and to render or supply any services, assistance or accommodation to travellers, merchants, manufacturers, professional men, and others; to receive money and articles for safe custody; and to undertake and execute any agency or agencies, to introduce overseas and other visitors to approved shops, stores and other business houses.

I “(B) To establish and carry on information bureaux at such places as may be thought fit for the collection, tabulation and distribution of information to members and others, and upon such terms as may be thought proper, as to trade, commerce, industry, education, art, science, duties, travel, sport, houses, hotels and restaurants, and other matters and things as may be deemed expedient.

“(C) To carry on either separately or in conjunction with one another all or any of the businesses of hotel and refreshment room proprietors, and licensed victuallers, beer, wine and spirit merchants, cigar and tobacco dealers, grocers, confectionery and sweet dealers, travel agents, theatrical and entertainment agents, stationers, printers and publishers; to establish, manage and conduct a club or clubs, and provide accommodation, games and recreations for members and others; to supply food and drinks, both alcoholic and non-alcoholic; and generally to provide such privileges, advantages and accommodation as are usually provided by a club.

"(D) To carry on any other trade or business whatsoever which can in the opinion of the board of directors be advantageously carried on by the company in connexion with or as ancillary to any of the above businesses or the general business of the company."

So far, one can find, in the objects clause, nothing that could justify the plaintiff company in carrying on the business of pig-breeders, unless it was carried on in connexion with or as ancillary to some other business of the company—which was not the present case.

There then follow a number of sub-clauses in much more general terms, some of which are capable of being interpreted as objects upon which the plaintiff company could embark as separate and distinct businesses. For instance, sub-cl. (F) is in these terms:

"To purchase or by other means acquire and protect prolong extend and renew whether in the United Kingdom or elsewhere any copyrights, patents, patent rights, trademarks, designs, rights of production, rights of publication or other rights, brevets d'invention, and licences which may appear likely to be advantageous or useful to the company and to use and turn to account and to manufacture under or grant licences or privileges in respect of the same and to expend money in experimenting upon and testing and in improving or seeking to improve any patents inventions or rights which the company may acquire or propose to acquire."

On the other hand, some of the sub-clauses are in terms which make it plain that what is referred to in the sub-clause could not, taken in isolation, authorise the company to embark on any kind of activity. For instance, sub-cl. (J):

"To manufacture sell treat and deal in all kinds of commodities substances materials articles and things necessary or useful for carrying on any of the businesses of the company or in or for any of the operations of the company."

A paragraph so framed clearly infers that there must be some business of the plaintiff company or some operation of the plaintiff company in existence in connexion with which the commodities sold or dealt with under this sub-clause are to be sold or dealt in. Perhaps the most obvious example of that kind of sub-clause is the last one, which is in the common form, sub-cl. (Y):

"To do all such other things as may be incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects or any of them."

That sub-clause necessarily involves supposing that the plaintiff company is engaged on some other activities as well as those which the sub-clause is designed to authorise the plaintiff company to embark on.

The objects clause ends with a paragraph in these words:

"It is hereby expressly declared that each of the preceding sub-clauses shall be construed independently of and shall be in no way limited by reference to any other sub-clause and that the objects set out in each sub-clause are independent objects of the company."

Now sub-cl. (N), which is the one which has to be considered for the present purpose, relates to borrowing and it is in these terms:

"To borrow or raise money in such manner as the company shall think fit and in particular by the issue of debentures or debenture stock perpetual or otherwise and to secure the repayment of any money borrowed or raised by mortgage charge or lien upon the undertaking and the whole or any part of the company's property or assets whether present or future including

- A its uncalled capital and also by a similar mortgage charge or lien to secure and guarantee the performance by the company of any obligation or liability it may undertake."

In these circumstances, the question is whether, on the true construction of the plaintiff company's memorandum of association, the plaintiff company was empowered to carry on the business of pig-breeding as its sole business, and whether, on the true interpretation of the memorandum of association, it had power to borrow the moneys which in fact it did borrow from the defendant bank. I have been taken all through the objects clause with great care by counsel for the liquidator of the plaintiff company and I have been satisfied that one can find, in none of the sub-clauses of the objects clause, any power to carry on such a business as the sole business of the plaintiff company. Moreover, counsel for the defendant bank has conceded that he cannot successfully argue that so carrying on the business of pig-breeding was within the powers of the plaintiff company.

Accordingly, the first question raised by the summons must be answered in the negative. There is little difficulty about that question, but there is more difficulty about the second question.

Where a company incorporated under the Companies Act, 1948, has the power to borrow, that fact must be discovered from its memorandum of association. The power may be one which has to be inferred from the objects of the company, or it may be one that is expressly conferred on the company by the terms of its memorandum. If the power to borrow is one which is inferred, it naturally follows that the borrowing is only within the power of the company in relation to those matters in respect of which the inference arises. Where the memorandum is one in which those sub-clauses of the objects clause, which confer what are truly powers rather than objects, are to be read as subsidiary to the main and real objects of the company, in such a case also the borrowing power must be read as confined to borrowing for the purposes for which the company is formed. Moreover, borrowing for any purpose other than the legitimate activities of the company will be ultra vires, and if the lender is aware of the circumstances which render the borrowing ultra vires he will be unable to recover the moneys as moneys lent.

The question in this case is, what is the combined effect of sub-cl. (N), which relates to borrowing, and the paragraph at the end of the objects clause, which constitutes each sub-clause independent object of the company? I have to read the whole of the objects clause as one for the purpose of discovering how I should interpret that final paragraph of the clause.

This clause does not, as it is sometimes the case, include any words which make the final paragraph subject to an exception where the context otherwise requires, but it seems to me that, reading the objects clause as a whole, the final paragraph must be read, by inference, as subject to such an exception, for, as I have pointed out, there are some sub-clauses which are incapable of constituting independent objects of the plaintiff company, if that expression means that the contents of a particular sub-clause are to be regarded as authorising something which the company can carry on as its sole activity. For there are sub-clauses which, by their express terms, require that the plaintiff company shall have other activities in addition to those carried on under the particular sub-clause.

The first part of the final paragraph of the objects clause relates purely to interpretation. It provides that each sub-clause shall be construed independently of the other clauses, and that none of them shall be limited by reference to any of the others. That goes purely to interpretation of the language of each sub-clause. Then the paragraph goes on to say that the objects set out in each sub-clause are independent objects of the plaintiff company. It would seem that those words, unless they are tautologous, must be intended to add something to what has gone before and are not merely directed to ensuring that the sub-clauses shall, for the purposes of construction only, be read without reference to one another. It is, in my judgment, an attempt on the part of the draftsman to set up each of the sub-clauses as stating an object which the plaintiff company could, properly, carry on without its embarking on any other object at all. If I read this final paragraph as being subject to an implied exception in the case of any clause where the internal context of the sub-clause itself makes it impossible to read the subject-matter of that sub-clause as being an independent object in the sense that I stated, then it is possible to give these final words of the closing paragraph some sensible operation. For instance, it would make it clear that the plaintiff company can, properly, under sub-cl. (F), which I have read, embark on the business of exploiting some copyright or patent, or other similar right, as a separate business by itself and not as an ancillary business associated with some other business of the company.

There are other sub-clauses which are framed in general language which would also be capable of being used by the company as a means of justifying their embarking on various types of business. For instance, sub-cl. (C) authorises the plaintiff company 'To build, construct, maintain, alter, enlarge, pull down and remove . . . ' and so on, "... buildings, shops . . ." of various kinds and erections or machines "... and to work, manage and control . . ." and, under that sub-clause, if it is treated as an independent object of the plaintiff company, the company could embark on kinds of business which had nothing whatever to do with the objects to be found in sub-cll. (A) to (D) of the memorandum. If I am to interpret the final paragraph of the objects clause in this way, it is said that the effect of so doing, in relation to sub-cl. (N), is that borrowing by itself is an authorised activity of the plaintiff company irrespective of the purposes for which the moneys are borrowed.

Counsel for the defendant bank who, if I may say so, has presented what I think is a difficult argument in an admirably clear way, has said that if the canon of construction, which requires general clauses in a memorandum to be construed in the light of the main objects of the company and restricted to activities associated with those main objects, is excluded, as it clearly can be excluded by appropriate language (see the decision in Cotman v. Brougham (3)) and if, as he said, it is excluded here, then the construction of each sub-clause must depend on the wording of that clause read alone. Moreover, if the propriety of some particular transaction embarked on by the plaintiff company is questioned, one has only to consider, so he contends, whether it falls within the language of any of the sub-clauses so construed. He said also that to borrow or raise money on security is clearly authorised by sub-cl. (N) and that the operation of borrowing money on security is one which is to be regarded as an independent object, that is to say, as an activity which the plaintiff company is authorised to embark on, irrespective of how the money is to be used. If, in fact, the money is used for ultra vires purposes, the shareholders may well be able to complain and, indeed, would be able to complain of the application of the money in that way. Counsel for the defendant bank contends, however, that the lender is not concerned with that at all; he is merely required to look at the plaintiff company's memorandum of association, and seeing that borrowing or raising money on security is one of the independent objects of the company he need not look any further into the matter. This, says counsel for the defendant bank, would facilitate commercial dealings and coincide with commercial convenience and, in that connexion, he relies on observations made by LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in the course of his speech in Cotman v. Brougham (4), where he said:

(4) [1918-19] All E.R. Rep. at p. 268; [1918] A.C. at p. 520.

A substratum is a question of equity between a company and its shareholders. The question whether or not a transaction is ultra vires is a question of law between the company and a third party. The truth is that the statement of a company's objects in its memorandum is intended to serve a double purpose. In the first place it gives protection to subscribers, who learn from it the purposes to which their money can be applied. In the second place

B it gives protection to persons who deal with the company, and who can infer from it the extent of the company's powers. The narrower the objects expressed in the memorandum the less is the subscriber's risk, but the wider such objects the greater is the security of those who transact business with the company."

C Later, LORD PARKER said (5):

"For the purpose of determining whether a company's substratum be gone, it may be necessary to distinguish between power and object and to determine what is the main or paramount object of the company, but I do not think this is necessary where a transaction is impeached as ultra vires. A person who deals with a company is entitled to assume that a company D can do everything which it is expressly authorised to do by its memorandum of association, and need not investigate the equities between the company and its shareholders."

The question is, in my judgment, whether it is legitimate to interpret sub-cl. (N) in conjunction with the concluding paragraph of the objects clause in that way.

Now to borrow money, by itself, without intending to use the money for any

E purpose, would be a senseless operation. If the company were to borrow money and, like the servant in the parable (6), were to bury it in the ground until the creditor returned and demanded repayment, then to disinter it and pay it back again, the whole procedure would be senseless. Borrowing is only a sensible activity if it is associated with some use to which the borrowed money is proposed and intended to be put, and if one were to treat sub-cl. (N) as conferring on the

F plaintiff company the power to do something in isolation from any other activities at all as its sole activity, sub-cl. (N) becomes an irrational clause. Although one does not find, in this sub-clause of the memorandum, any words expressly referring to any other businesses or activities of the plaintiff company, the very nature of the transaction contemplated by sub-cl. (N) infers, I think, that the company must have in view purposes to which the money shall be applied. That

G is to say, that the power to borrow or raise money is a power to borrow or raise money for the purposes of the plaintiff company. If that be the right way in which to construe the sub-clause, then it does not authorise borrowing or raising money for any purpose which is not a legitimate activity of the plaintiff company. Moreover, notwithstanding the provision in the concluding paragraph of the objects clause—that sub-cl. (N) is to be treated as an independent object of

H the plaintiff company—I think that, on the true construction of that sub-clause, it is apparent that it is one of the sub-clauses which falls into the category of sub-clauses which relate to matters incapable of being read as independent objects in the sense that they authorise the plaintiff company to undertake some activity as its sole activity.

If I am right in thinking that this sub-clause only authorises borrowing or

I raising money for the legitimate purposes of the plaintiff company, that really concludes the argument, in my judgment, for the moneys that were borrowed from the bank were not borrowed for legitimate purposes of the company; they were borrowed for ultra vires activities in which the plaintiff company was engaged. Accordingly, it seems to me, on analysis, that sub-cl. (N) must be construed in such a way that it is incapable of being an independent object and, accordingly, the power it confers on the plaintiff company falls to be determined in accordance with the ordinary principles applicable to such a clause in the objects clause of a company where there is no such declaration as is contained in the final paragraph in the present case.

(5) [1918-19] All E.R. Rep. at p. 269; [1918] A.C. at p. 521.

In arriving at this conclusion, I am construing sub-cl. (N) without regard to anything that is found in any of the other clauses of the objects clause, and I am relying solely on the contents and language of that particular sub-clause. I think I am, to some extent, reinforced in the view I have taken by the final words of sub-cl. (N), which relate to guaranteeing the performance by the plaintiff company of any obligation or liability it may undertake. That part of the sub-clause clearly refers to obligations and liabilities arising outside sub-cl. (N) and as the result of other activities of the plaintiff company, and although that circumstance by itself would not be sufficient to control the interpretation of the earlier part of sub-cl. (N), the fact that this provision at the end of the sub-clause infers other activities on the part of the plaintiff company, I think reinforces my view that the earlier part of the sub-clause is also properly to be read as inferring other activities of the plaintiff company. So, in my judgment, the whole clause must be interpreted as relating to borrowing on security for the purposes, that is to say, legitimate purposes, of the plaintiff company and guaranteeing obligations and liabilities arising out of other legitimate obligations of the plaintiff company.

Consequently, in my judgment, the second question in the summons should also be answered in the negative (7). Accordingly, I will make a declaration on both clauses in those terms.

LLOYD v. BRASSEY.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Parker, C.J., James and Bridge, J.J.), June 26, 1968.]

Employment—Redundancy—Dismissal by reason of redundancy—Owner farmer sold farm by public auction, and subsequently, by another public auction the live and dead stock—Incoming farmer bought only part of live and dead stock—Employee farm worker was re-employed by new owner without any break in employment and continued in similar work—Whether change of ownership of business—Whether employee entitled to redundancy payment from vendor farmer—Redundancy Payments Act 1965 (c. 62) s. 13 (1) (a).

On Mar. 10, 1958, the appellant a general farm worker, entered the employment of the respondent, a farmer. On Oct. 28, 1966, the respondent, as a result of a sale at a public auction, entered into a contract to sell the farm land and buildings to one B., the date of completion being March, 1967. On Mar. 11, 1967, a dispersal sale was held of the live and dead stock of the farm. B. bought fourteen out of the 129 lots of dead stock and twenty out of the forty-six lots of live stock. The appellant's employment by the respondent ended on the same day, Mar. 11, when the appellant entered the employment of B., receiving from B. an extra £1 weekly and free living, and continuing to do for B. much the same work as the appellant had done for the respondent. On appeal from dismissal of an application by the appellant for a redundancy payment,

Held: having regard to the separate sales of land and of the live and dead stock, and to the fact that not all the assets of the farm were purchased by B., there was not a change in the ownership of the farm business within

A s. 13 (1)* of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 but only a transfer of assets of the farming business; accordingly s. 13 (1) did not apply, with the consequence that the appellant was deemed by virtue of s. 1 (2)† of the Act of 1965 to be dismissed by reason of redundancy and was entitled to a redundancy payment from the respondent (see p. 1231, letter G, and p. 1232, letter E, post).

B Appeal allowed.

[ Editorial Note. In considering the present decision with that in Bandey v. Penn ([1968] 1 All E.R. 1187) it is to be observed that in the present case there was no express dismissal of the appellant by his employer, the respondent, at the time of the sale of assets of the farm and no express termination of the employment by either of them. So far as express arrangement between the C appellant and the respondent is concerned, the only express arrangement seems to have been between the appellant and the incoming farmer for the continuance in employment, or re-employment, of the appellant by the incoming farmer. Termination of employment is deemed dismissal in certain circumstances by s. 3 (1) and by s. 22 of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, and in the present case the position was treated before the tribunal on the basis that there was a D dismissal of the appellant by the respondent.

Appeal.

This was an appeal by the appellant, Eric Lloyd, against a decision of the Industrial Tribunal at Manchester recorded on Jan. 23, 1968, consequent on F the hearing on Jan. 8, 1968; by their decision the tribunal rejected the appellant's application for a redundancy payment in respect of the termination of his employment with the respondent, Mr. Brassey.

In their reasons the tribunal found that the present appellant had started work for the respondent on Mar. 10, 1958, as a general farm worker, and had worked continuously until Mar. 11, 1967; that the farm land and buildings had G been sold by auction in 1966 to a Mr. Barlow, who had lived at and worked on the farm since Mar. 11, 1967, when at another public auction of the stock and farm equipment he had purchased some of the live and dead stock. The appellant had continued to work at the farm throughout without any break at all and was still working there for Mr. Barlow. The appellant's present terms of employment, so the tribunal found, had been agreed between himself and Mr. Barlow H a week before the auction sale of stock on Mar. 11, 1967, but the offer of continued employment had not been put into writing. The respondent did not give evidence before the tribunal. In evidence before the tribunal the present appellant stated that he had a written contract of employment with the respondent, who told him that he had sold the land and buildings in October, 1966, to Mr. Barlow, but didn't say what was to happen to the appellant, or that there would be a I job with Mr. Barlow or that the appellant's work would continue. Early in 1967, about February, the respondent had told the appellant, according to the appellant's evidence, that Mr. Barlow would be approaching the appellant to see whether he would like to stay on with Mr. Barlow or to go elsewhere. On Mar. 3, 1967, Mr. Barlow came to see the appellant and asked him what he was going to do. The appellant said that it depended on what sort of terms could be agreed. On the following morning the appellant and Mr. Barlow agreed terms and, as the appellant said in evidence, he continued working without a break in his employment, and there was "no break in my employment at all". There was a contract of employment of the appellant made on a blue form issued by the National Farmers' Union. A

The appellant appealed pursuant to notice of motion dated Mar. 8, 1968, seeking an order that the decision of the tribunal be set aside on the ground that the tribunal was wrong in law (a) in deciding that, because the tribunal held that farming was a business, s. 13 of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 automatically applied; (b) in failing to consider whether Mr. Barlow was conducting a business and (c) in failing to consider whether, if Mr. Barlow was conducting a business, there had been a change of ownership of the respondent's business within the meaning of s. 13 (1) (a). B

D. J. Turner-Samuels for the appellant.

J. T. Plume for the respondent.

LORD PARKER, C.J.: The appellant is a general farm worker who, on Mar. 10, 1958, became employed by the respondent, Mr. Brassey of Bulkeley Grange Farm, Malpas, Cheshire. On Mar. 11, 1967, the respondent ceased to farm at Bulkeley Grange Farm, and, accordingly, the present appellant's contract of employment by the respondent terminated. Section 1 (2) of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 provides that: D

"For the purposes of this Act an employee who is dismissed shall be taken to be dismissed by reason of redundancy if the dismissal is attributable wholly or mainly to—(a) the fact that his employer has ceased, or intends to cease, to carry on the business for the purposes of which the employee was employed . . . in the place where the employee was so employed . . ."

Accordingly, on the facts that I have so far stated, it would seem clear that there was a dismissal by reason of redundancy, and the appellant would be entitled to a redundancy payment from the respondent. That, however, is not the whole story, because on Oct. 28, 1966, the respondent entered into a contract to sell the farm land and buildings comprising 150 acres of mixed farming for £49,500 to a Mr. Barlow; it was in fact a sale resulting from a public auction. The respondent stayed on, the date of completion not being until March, 1967, until Mar. 11, on which day a dispersal sale was held of the live and dead stock of the farm. Mr. Barlow on that date bought some £2,244 worth of the live and dead stock being some fourteen lots out of 129 lots of dead stock and about twenty lots out of forty-six lots of the live stock. Mr. Barlow approached the appellant to ask him if he would stay on: he readily agreed to do so and in fact Mr. Barlow paid him an extra £1 a week over what the respondent had paid him, and gave him free living accommodation, whereas the respondent had charged him 6s. for his cottage. F

It is in those circumstances that the respondent relies on s. 13 of the Act of 1965. So far as it is material, s. 13 provides that: G

"(1) The provisions of this section shall have effect where—(a) a change occurs (whether by virtue of a sale or other disposition or by operation of law) in the ownership of a business for the purposes of which a person is employed. H

"(2) If, by agreement with the employee, the person who immediately after the change occurs is the owner of the business or of the part of the business in question, as the case may be (in this section referred to as 'the new owner') renews the employee's contract of employment (with the substitution of the new owner for the previous owner) or re-engages him I * Dallow Industrial Properties, Ltd. v. Else, [1967] 2 All E.R. 30; [1967] 2 Q.B. 448; Kenmir, Ltd. v. Frizzell, [1968] 1 All E.R. 414.

- A under a new contract of employment, s. 3 (2) of this Act shall have effect as if the renewal or re-engagement had been a renewal or re-engagement by the previous owner (without any substitution of the new owner for the previous owner)."

I find it unnecessary to go back to s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1965, because the sole question here is whether sub-s. (2) came into force, in other words whether there had been a change in the ownership of the business (1) within s. 13 (1).

- B For myself I find this a difficult case: it at first sight strikes one as a matter of common-sense that here is a man, the present appellant, in exactly the same job as he had originally on the same premises, carrying on the same activity under Mr. Barlow as he had been carrying on under the respondent. Looked at from another point of view, it could be said with considerable force that
- C what Mr. Barlow is doing is exactly what the respondent was doing, using this farm for the purposes of general farming. There has been complete continuity, the farm being handed over to Mr. Barlow so that he carries on exactly the same activities as the respondent had been carrying on. However, the real question is whether what has occurred in this case does bring the case within s. 13 (1).

- D There has been a considerable number of cases on s. 13 (1) and on what I may call the obverse, under para. 10 of Sch. 1 to the Contracts of Employment Act 1963. I find it unnecessary to refer to those cases except one which deals with farming (2). It is quite clear from those cases that one has to look at the substance of the matter rather than the form, and secondly, that while there is no single test whether there has been a change in ownership of a business,
- E a mere transfer of assets and nothing more does not amount to a change in ownership of a business. Bearing that in mind one looks again at what happened in the present case. An asset in the farming activity, namely the farm itself, was undoubtedly transferred, and it can be said in favour of there being a transfer that unlike the ordinary case of a transfer of factory premises, it is the farm itself which combines not merely the premises but also some of the stock-in-trade: it includes all the growing crops. On the other hand, there has been no
- F transfer of goodwill; in this type of farming there is no goodwill to transfer; there is no question of contracts being taken over by the purchaser, and no question of liabilities in the sense of debts being taken over, and no question of a restrictive covenant being imposed on the seller. More important, as it seems to me, is the fact that it was not all the assets of the business, necessary for the
- G activity to be carried on, that were transferred. As I have said on Mar. 11 there was what was quite properly called an agricultural dispersal sale of all the live stock, the dead stock, and indeed the furniture of the farm. It was not all taken over, whether at a valuation or by purchase at auction, by Mr. Barlow; he merely took over such part of the live and dead stock and furniture as he required. Looked at broadly in those circumstances, it seems to me quite
- H impossible to say that there was here a transfer of the ownership of a business.

As I have said, it is not an easy point because it can well be said that the result looks as if it was in conflict with what one would think would be the intention of Parliament in such a case. It must be remembered, however, that

I if the appellant does not get and is not entitled to a redundancy payment from the respondent, he will in the future get a redundancy payment from Mr. Barlow, assuming that he remains in his employ for the relevant period and is later dismissed for redundancy.

(1) The term "business" is defined in s. 25 of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 as follows: "(1) In this Part of this Act 'business' includes a trade or profession and includes any activity carried on by a body of persons, whether corporate or unincorporate . . ."

(2) Bandey v. Penn, [1968] 1 All E.R. 1187.

Finally, as it seems to me, Bandey v. Penn (3), a decision of this court, is one which we should follow. That is the only case in regard to transfer of a business relating to farming that has so far been before the court. In that case the appellant, a stockman and general farm worker, was given notice by his employer, who in that case was a tenant farmer who was giving up his lease. In due course the farm was taken over by another tenant farmer who asked the appellant to work for him. The appellant refused, and if there had been a transfer of the business it was clear and was so held that it was an unreasonable refusal on behalf of the appellant. This court held that in those circumstances the respondent was not disposing of the ownership of a business, but merely terminating lease, an asset in the business. Though it can be said the present case is distinguishable on the facts, it seems to me that the principle involved is the same, and that in each case what was being given up by the alleged transferor was an asset in the business. Accordingly, in my judgment this tribunal came to a wrong decision in law and I would allow this appeal. It would follow that in default of agreement it should go back to the tribunal to assess the quantum of the payment.

JAMES, J.: I confess to having entertained considerable doubts in this matter during the course of the argument. In the end, since on the facts of this particular case the freehold was dealt with separately from the stock, and the sale of the stock was as described, a genuine agricultural dispersal sale by the respondent, I am persuaded that the tribunal were wrong in law in finding that there had been a change in the ownership of a business within the meaning of s. 13 of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, and wrong in holding that the appellant's employment had remained continuous. I, too, am unable to find any effective distinction between this case and Bandey v. Penn (3) to which LORD PARKER, C.J., has referred. I agree that the appeal should succeed.

BRIDGE, J.: I agree and would only add this. LORD PARKER, C.J., has pointed out that the corollary to a decision that the appellant in this case is not entitled to a redundancy payment from the respondent, would be that, by the operation of s. 8 of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 and Sch. 1 to the Contracts of Employment Act 1963, the appellant would in due course, if he should be dismissed on account of redundancy by Mr. Barlow, become entitled to a redundancy payment from Mr. Barlow calculated by reference not only to his period of service with Mr. Barlow, but also to his prior period of service as an employee of the respondent. Mr. Barlow is, of course, not before the court. It might well be said on his behalf, however, that it would be a surprising result that he, having purchased at one public auction 150 acres of farming land, and having purchased at a subsequent public auction substantially less than half the lots offered on a dispersal sale of agricultural live and dead stock, but not having, in any ordinary sense entered into a transaction in which he took over lock stock and barrel an existing business with its existing liabilities, should find himself in this one instance saddled with what in effect was a liability of the former employer, namely the liability to pay redundancy payment to this appellant in respect of this appellant's service with the respondent. I agree in the order proposed by my lords.

The plaintiff, a corporate entity carrying on business in East Germany, brought an action in England against another organisation of the same name carrying on business in West Germany, claiming, among other claims, that all the property and assets of the West German company belonged to the plaintiff. On a preliminary issue, whether the defendants would be so accountable, whatever the decision in the main action should be,

Held: a claim of the kind made in the plaintiff's separate action, against solicitors having conduct of a defence in an action and acting honestly therein, was contrary to public policy as obstructing the course of justice, and should not be entertained by the court; accordingly the action against the solicitors would be dismissed (see p. 1237, letter H, p. 1239, letter I, and p. 1241, letter A, post).

Preliminary issue.

The plaintiff, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung, a corporate body according to the law of the German Democratic Republic which carried on business there, issued a writ on Mar. 18, 1968, claiming an account of all moneys come to the hands of the defendants or either of them being the property of the plaintiff, and payment to the plaintiff of all sums found due on taking such account. The defendants were Herbert Smith & Co. and Dehn & Lauderdale, both firms of solicitors, who were acting or had acted for the defendants in a subsisting action, to which the title was 1955 C. No. 4445 Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Rayner & Keeler, Ltd. and Others, brought by the plaintiff in the present action. By an order dated May 23, 1968, the Court of Appeal* directed the trial of a preliminary issue in the following terms

"That irrespective of the decision upon any issue in the action 1955 C. No. 4445 . . . neither of the defendants herein would be accountable to the plaintiff in respect of any fees, costs or disbursements received by them from or on behalf of the defendants in that action so long as the defendants act honestly as solicitors on behalf of the said defendants and receive such fees, costs and disbursements in their capacity as solicitors."

The preliminary issue now comes before the court (PENNYCUICK, J.) for decision.

J. A. Brightman, Q.C., D. W. Falconer, Q.C., and J. R. Reid for the plaintiff.
Michael Kerr, Q.C., C. J. Slade, Q.C., and G. Slyn for the defendants.

June 26. PENNYCUICK, J.: I have before me a preliminary issue directed by the Court of Appeal* to be determined before the trial of this action. The action stems from another action, of which the title is 1955 C. No. 4445 Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Rayner and Keeler, Ltd. (1). I will refer to that as the main action.

By the pleading in the main action, as amended, the plaintiff corporation, a body now established in the German Democratic Republic (to which I will refer as "the East German company"), claims inter alia that it is the owner of the entire undertaking carried on by the third defendant, which equally bears the name Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung, a body established in the German Federal Republic (to which I will refer as the "West German company"), or alternatively that the West German company holds that undertaking in trust for the East German company. Those claims are formulated in these terms in the amended statement of claim:

"4F. The said business in West Germany is and always has been the property of the plaintiffs and all its trade marks, trade names, patents, goods and other assets of every kind including in particular such of them as have been or are in the United Kingdom are the property of the plaintiffs. . . . 4H. . . . In the premises all the West German assets originally and from time to time subsequently acquired by the third defendants including in particular such of the West German assets as are or may have been in the United Kingdom are or have or are deemed to be or have been the property of the plaintiffs or are or were held in trust for the plaintiffs."

(1) See [1964] 3 All E.R. 326; [1965] Ch. 525; and [1966] 2 All E.R. 536; [1967] 1 A.C. 853.

- A The West German company has employed solicitors in this country in connexion with the main action. It originally employed Messrs. Dehn & Lauderdale, who are the second defendants in the present action. Since 1964 it has employed Messrs. Herbert Smith & Co., who are the first defendants in the present action. In the course of this employment each firm of solicitors has already received considerable sums from the West German company to meet
- B disbursements and in respect of profit costs. As this extremely heavy action proceeds, Messrs. Herbert Smith & Co. will in the ordinary course receive further and much larger sums. The East German company now claims against each firm of solicitors that the firm is accountable to the East German company for all moneys received by it from the assets in the hands of the West German company. This claim is made on the footing either that the East German
- C company is the owner of these assets or, alternatively, that the West German company holds these assets as trustee for the East German company and, on either footing, that the solicitors have at all material times had notice of the interest of the East German company.

The writ in the present action was issued on Mar. 18, 1968. The statement of claim contains the following para. 5:

- D “The plaintiff will refer to and rely upon the pleadings and judgments in the said action. Each of the defendants by reason of their acting in the said action well knew all the facts and matters averred and proved or to be proved therein. Each of the defendants has received the said moneys with notice that such moneys are the property of the plaintiffs. Accordingly each of the defendants is liable to account to the plaintiff.”

- E The claim in the present action cannot from its nature be effectively determined until the main action itself has been determined, but its existence causes intense embarrassment to the West Germany company and Messrs. Herbert Smith & Co. in the prosecution of the main action. In those circumstances, the two defendant firms of solicitors applied by motion for the trial of a preliminary issue to
- F determine their liability, should the East German company succeed in the main action.

By an order dated May 23, 1968, the Court of Appeal (2) directed the trial of a preliminary issue in the following terms:

- G “That irrespective of the decision upon any issue in the action 1955 C. No. 4445 referred to in the pleadings herein, neither of the defendants herein would be accountable to the plaintiff in respect of any fees, costs or disbursements received by them from or on behalf of the defendants in that action so long as the defendants herein act honestly as solicitors on behalf of the said defendants, and receive such fees, costs and disbursements in their said capacity of solicitors.”

- H I will for convenience refer only to Messrs. Herbert Smith & Co. Whatever is said with regard to Messrs. Herbert Smith & Co. applies, so far as relevant, also to Messrs. Dehn & Lauderdale.

- I It is common ground that the words “irrespective of the decision upon any issue in the (main) action” cover the event that in the main action the East German company succeeds in its contention that the East German company owns the undertaking carried on by the West German company or, alternatively, that the West German company holds that undertaking in trust for the East German company. It is accepted on behalf of Messrs. Herbert Smith & Co. that they have at all material times had notice of the East German company's claim, but not of course that they accept or ought reasonably to accept its validity. On the contrary, they strenuously deny its validity.

It is accepted on behalf of the East German company that Messrs. Herbert Smith & Co. have throughout acted honestly as solicitors on behalf of the West German company and received their fees in that capacity. I proceed on the assumption that this position will continue throughout the action. A

The issues in the main action are complicated, involving questions of foreign law and English law as well as issues of fact, but it is unnecessary for the purposes of the present issue to consider anything but the simplified question indicated by the wording to which I have referred.

The contention of the East German company is based on the well-established principle that a person who acquires or retains property subject to a trust, with notice of that trust, becomes a constructive trustee of that property for the beneficiaries: see 38 HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND (3rd Edn.) 858, para. 1446. Counsel for the East German company contends that Messrs. Herbert Smith & Co. have notice of the trust and, if at the end of the day the trust is established in the main action, they will be accountable as constructive trustees for all moneys comprised in that trust which they have received from the West German company. B C

Counsel for the West German company resists this contention on two main grounds, namely: (i) a claim of this kind against solicitors having the conduct of an action is contrary to public policy in the sense that it obstructs the course of justice; (ii) the general principle stated above does not, with certain exceptions, apply to an agent in whose hands the property has been placed by his principal. I propose to consider these two grounds in that order. D

(i) I see the very greatest force in this contention. If such a claim can be maintained the result is that, whenever an action is brought for the recovery of assets alleged to be trust property and that action succeeds, the defendant's solicitors come under a personal liability to the plaintiff for moneys which have been knowingly received by them from their own clients out of the subject-matter of the action. Their liability attaches impartially in respect of profit costs retained by them and in respect of disbursements made by them, including counsel's fees, the expenses of obtaining evidence and so forth. The solicitors could no doubt generally recover counsel's fees, but the other disbursements would be irretrievably lost. E

The prospect of this personal liability would be a grave deterrent to a responsible solicitor undertaking the conduct of such an action at all, for, unless his client had enough resources apart from the subject matter of the action, the conduct of the action would represent a gamble on his client's success, a highly undesirable state of affairs. If he did undertake the defence, the fact that he was at risk in regard to this liability might, and in many circumstances almost inevitably would, tend to influence and hamper him at various stages in the action, for example, on the question whether expense should be incurred in obtaining evidence from a particular expert witness. He might even find that his interest was in conflict with his duty to his client, for example, in connexion with some suggested compromise. There can I think be no doubt that such a claim would represent a very serious obstruction in the course of justice. It is worth-while to notice that, if a right of action exists against a solicitor in such circumstances, a corresponding right of action must automatically exist against counsel, that is to say, counsel would be at risk of having to account to the other party for fees received by him from his own client if the defence of the action failed. This too would be a highly undesirable position. F G H

The contrary factor urged on behalf of the East German company is that, if such a claim is not available against the defendant's solicitor, then, should the action succeed, the unsuccessful defence will have been financed out of the plaintiff's money. This is a serious consideration, but it should be borne in mind (i) that in simple circumstances (unlike the present) the plaintiff, on making out a sufficient prima facie case, could obtain an injunction restraining the defendant from dealing with the subject matter of the action pending its determination; and (ii) that the defendant himself would, so far as I can see, certainly be accountable to the plaintiff for trust money applied by the defendant in the defence of the action. It is only where the former remedy is not available or has I

A not been sought, and further where the defendant is unable to meet his personal liability, that the claim against the defendant's solicitors would become of substantial importance.

There appears to be a lack of authority on the point. The only case in which the point appears to have been mentioned is that of La Roche v. Armstrong (3). The headnote in that case is as follows (4):

B "In a dispute between two parties, letters and negotiations between their respective solicitors, which are written or declared to be without prejudice, are inadmissible in evidence not only against the parties themselves but also against the solicitors.

C "In an action by A against B, in which the title to a chattel is in question, admissions by a person previously entitled which were made during the continuance of his or her interest, and which qualify or affect the title, may be given in evidence against B: but such evidence is not admissible where no question of title arises and where the question at issue is merely the right to a sum of money:—

D "Seemingly, a solicitor who receives from his client for the purpose of his or her defence a sum of money which A alleges was trust money in the client's hands is under no duty to preserve the money as such trust money or to refuse to apply it in accordance with the client's directions."

It will be seen that the action was decided on the grounds mentioned in the first two paragraphs in the headnote, and there appears to have been no argument on the question of liability. LUSH, J., concluded his judgment with this observation (5):

E "I would add this. Here the solicitor had received a sum of money from his client for the purpose of his resisting on her behalf a claim by the plaintiff, who says it is trust money, and that the client is under a duty to return it. In such circumstances, I should be very loath to say that the solicitor, who cannot know the real truth of the matter, inasmuch as he hears one story from his client and another from the plaintiff, is bound to hold the money not for his client, but for the plaintiff whose claim is not yet established. This is not an ordinary case of the misuse of trust money. The defendant has utilised the money for the purpose for which he received it. Even if the difficulty of the onus of proof were surmounted, it would be hard for the plaintiff to succeed and, in this case the judgment must be for the defendant."

I have not attached undue weight to the obiter observations of LUSH, J., but, so far as they go, they do afford support to the West German company's contentions.

I have reached the conclusion that a claim of this kind does indeed obstruct the course of justice and that the court ought not to entertain it.

H Counsel for the East German company has contended that the objection now advanced by the West German company would represent a new head of public policy and that the court should not lightly entertain new heads of public policy. In support of this contention he supplied a helpful list of claims which have been held to be contrary to public policy, and pointed out that the only instance at all resembling the present is the claim considered by the House of Lords in the recent case of Rondel v. Worsley (6), an action for negligence against a barrister. It seems to me that the East German company's claim here is a particular instance of the class of claims which obstruct the course of justice and is contrary to public policy in that sense. It is in this respect comparable to the claim in Rondel v. Worsley (6) and as such is not a new head of public policy. The court has always had an inherent jurisdiction to deal with claims which obstruct the course of justice. I am not sure that the claim might not have been labelled vexatious and that an application might not have been made to strike it out under R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19, but I need not pursue that point. A

I should mention one other argument which was suggested on this point by counsel for the West German company. He contended that, if the defendant could not employ the subject matter of an action to finance his defence, he might otherwise have no resources with which to do so. I am not impressed with this argument. Whatever difficulty a defendant may have in financing his case, that cannot justify his financing it at the ultimate expense of the plaintiff should the action succeed. I do not feel bound to pursue an inquiry as to what steps are open to a defendant in such circumstances. I would merely emphasise that the present issue is concerned with the liability of the defendant's solicitors and not with the liability of the defendant himself. B C

To avoid misunderstanding, I should say expressly that nothing in this judgment is addressed to costs which may be outstanding but unpaid when an action of this kind is finally determined adversely to the defendant.

(ii) The conclusion which I have reached on the first ground is sufficient to dispose of the issue. By far the greater part of the argument was, however, addressed to the second ground. In case I am wrong on the first ground I ought at least to summarise the argument on the second ground. I propose to do so very briefly without detailed citation of authority. This is a point of considerable general importance and it would not be desirable for me to express obiter a decided view on it. D

Counsel for the West German company, while not challenging the general principle which I have cited from HALSBURY, contended that the principle does not in general apply to an agent in whose hands the trustee has placed trust property. The agent it is said, whether a solicitor or anyone else, owes no duty except to his principal, the trustee, and is not rendered a constructive trustee for the beneficiaries, merely by notice of their claim. It is accepted that the agent may render himself a constructive trustee by intermeddling in the trust or by co-operating in a breach of trust. In this connexion it is said that the agent co-operates in a breach of trust if he has certain knowledge that the claim is well-founded and disregards it, but mere notice of the claim is insufficient; nor of course is it his duty to investigate the claim. These contentions, if well-founded, produce the result that an agent being in possession of what is claimed to be trust property, of which his principal is a trustee, and having notice of that claim, unless he knows for certain that the claim is well-founded, is entitled and indeed bound, upon the direction of the trustee, and in complete disregard of the claim, to pay over the subject matter of the claim to the trustee himself or to a third party who might dissipate it. I should have thought that in such circumstances the claimant could in an ordinary case obtain an injunction to restrain the agent from so doing and that this injunction would be founded on the duty of the agent as constructive trustee. E F G H

In support of his contention counsel for the West German company relied on a number of text-book statements and on a line of cases which includes Nickolson v. Knowles (7), Barnes v. Addy (8), Re Blundell, Blundell v. Blundell (9) and Williams-Ashman v. Price & Williams (10). Nickolson v. Knowles (7) was a simple case of payment by a third party to an agent. The remaining cases and the text-book statements founded on them are concerned with a different state of affairs, namely, that in which the agent is employed by a trustee, acting or professedly acting in that capacity, but in relation to a situation which I

A involves a breach of trust. In Barnes v. Addy LORD SELBORNE, L.C., said (11):

"It is equally important to maintain the doctrine of trusts which is established in this court, and not to strain it by unreasonable construction beyond its due and proper limits. There would be no better mode of undermining the sound doctrine of equity than to make unreasonable and iniquitable applications of them.

B "Now in this case we may have to deal with certain persons who are trustees, and with certain other persons who are not trustees. That is a distinction to be borne in mind throughout the case. Those who create a trust clothe the trustee with a legal power and control over the trust property, imposing on him a corresponding responsibility. That responsibility may no doubt be extended in equity to others who are not properly trustees, if they

C are found either making themselves trustees de son tort, or actually participating in any fraudulent conduct of the trustee to the injury of the cestui que trust. But, on the other hand, strangers are not to be made constructive trustees merely because they act as the agents of trustees in transactions within their legal powers, transactions perhaps of which a court of equity may disapprove, unless those agents receive and become chargeable with some part of the trust property, or unless they assist with knowledge in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees."

See also the full analysis made by STIRLING, J., in Re Blundell (12).

It seems to me that the principle underlying this line of cases is inapplicable where the principal is not acting or purporting to act in the capacity of trustee at all, but is denying the existence of the trust: see the distinction drawn by

"It is well established by many decisions, that a mere agent of trustees is answerable only to his principal and not to cestuis que trust in respect of trust moneys coming to his hands merely in his character of agent. But it is also not less clearly established that a person who receives into his hands trust moneys, and who deals with them in a manner inconsistent with the performance of trusts of which he is cognisant, is personally liable for the consequences which may ensue upon his so dealing."

In a state of affairs such as the present, that is to say, where the principal is denying the existence of the trust, I do not see any reason in principle why the agent should be immune from proceedings by the beneficiary.

G A full discussion of the liability of an agent to third parties will be found in BOWSTEAD ON AGENCY (12th Edn.), pp. 278-283, where a great number of other authorities are collected. I do not think that in this obiter part of my judgment I ought to pursue that question further.

I have treated this matter on the footing that the East German company's claim is founded on trust. It appears that the position under the claim founded

H on ownership is in all relevant respects the same: see Nelson v. Larholt (14). It has not been contended otherwise.

I propose for the reasons given on the first ground to make a declaration in the negative, but inserting a few words, so that the declaration will run as follows:

I "That irrespective of the decision upon any issue in the action 1955 C. No. 4445 referred to in the pleadings herein, neither of the defendants herein would be accountable to the plaintiff in respect of any fees, costs or disbursements received by them from or on behalf of the defendants in the course of and before the final determination of that action so long as the defendants herein act honestly as solicitors on behalf of the defendants, and receive such fees, costs and disbursements in their said capacity of solicitors.” A

The purpose of the added words is to leave open the position with regard to fees which may be outstanding at the conclusion of the action should the East German company succeed.

[After argument.] B

Counsel for the defendants in this action, that is, the two firms of solicitors, now invites me, having decided the preliminary issue in their favour, to make an order under R.S.C., Ord. 33, r. 7, which is in these terms:

“ If it appears to the court that the decision of any question or issue arising in a cause or matter and tried separately from the cause or matter substantially disposes of the cause or matter or renders the trial of the cause or matter unnecessary, it may dismiss the cause or matter or make such other order or give such judgment therein as may be just.” C

It seems to me that the decision which I have given on the preliminary issue, if it is right, does indeed substantially dispose of this whole action and renders the trial of the action unnecessary. That is evidently the view which the Court of Appeal took because they said (15): D

“ If the issue of law is decided in their favour [that is in the solicitors’ favour] it will dispose of the claim against them, irrespective of the main action.”

Counsel for the East German company, invites me merely to make an order on the preliminary issue and let the action stand. So far as I can see there would be nothing left in the action and I do not think that it would be right to take that course. E

There was a discussion on the scope of an allegation in para. 4 of the statement of claim in this action, which is in these terms: F

“ From May 20, 1964, the first defendants have acted and continue to act as solicitors for the defendants in the said action. The second defendants are also a firm of solicitors carrying on that profession in the United Kingdom. From at least Nov. 11, 1955, until May 20, 1964, the second defendants acted as solicitors for the defendants in the said action. In the course of so acting each of the defendants have received in the United Kingdom moneys (of which no particulars can be given until after discovery herein) from the said organisation being part of the assets employed in such organisation or moneys arising from the said trade or business.” G

It would seem quite clear that, read in the whole context, that allegation is confined to moneys received by the two firms of solicitors in the course of acting as solicitors to the West German company in the main action. If I have decided this preliminary issue right, they are not accountable in respect of those moneys. The suggestion was made, that that allegation in the statement of claim might cover moneys received by the solicitors from the West German company otherwise than in the performance of their functions as solicitors in the action. I do not think that the allegation does cover such moneys. Perhaps to avoid misunderstanding I should say that the striking out of this action would not debar the East German company from starting a new action with regard to any such moneys, i.e., if they wished to contend that the West German company had paid to the defendants moneys belonging to the East German company otherwise than in the course of the performance by the defendants of their duties as solicitors in the main action. H I

A I think that in the circumstances it would not be right to keep this action alive and I propose simply to make an order dismissing the action.

Re WEIR'S SETTLEMENT.

MACPHERSON AND ANOTHER v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

C [CHANCERY DIVISION (Cross, J.), May 24, 27, 28, 29, June 19, 1968.]

Estate Duty—Discretionary trust—Exhaustive discretionary trust—Discretionary trust of income in favour of husband and wife continuing after death of husband in favour of wife alone—Wife recipient of all income throughout—Whether duty payable on whole fund on husband's death—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 1, s. 2 (1) (b).

D Under a settlement made by the wife's father on her marriage the income of the trust fund was held on discretionary trusts for the husband and wife and the issue of the marriage during a trust period that was not for the period of the life or lives of beneficiaries under the discretionary trust. There was no issue of the marriage. There was no trust for accumulation. The whole of the income was in fact paid to the wife from the time of the marriage. On the husband's death in the wife's lifetime estate duty was claimed* on the whole of the trust fund as having passed on his death, the statutory provisions relevant to the claim being s. 1 and s. 2 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1894†.

F Held: in view of the decisions in Burrell v. A.-G. and Scott v. Inland Revenue Comrs. estate duty was payable on the trust fund as having passed on his death (see p. 1252, letter C, post).

Burrell v. A.-G. ([1936] 3 All E.R. 758) and Scott v. Inland Revenue Comrs. ([1936] 3 All E.R. 752) followed.

[ Editorial Note. In the light of the decision in Public Trustee v. Inland Revenue Comrs. ([1960] 1 All E.R. 1) the true view seemed to the court to be that s. 2 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, constituted an exhaustive explanation of what was meant by the phrase "property . . . which passes on death" in s. 1, and in view of the decision in Gartside v. Inland Revenue Comrs. ([1968] 1 All E.R. 121) it seemed that s. 2 (1) (b), which was the only paragraph of s. 2 (1) relevant to the present case, did not apply so as to render estate duty exigible on the death of one of several objects of a discretionary trust, so that the truth appeared to be that Parliament in 1894, when passing the Finance Act of that year, had failed to take discretionary trusts into account (see p. 1248, letter I, p. 1249, letter D, and p. 1250, letter I, post). A court of first instance, however, was bound by the decisions of the House of Lords in Burrell's case and Scott's case, cited above, to make the determination as set out in the holding at letter F, above, although the construction of s. 1 and s. 2 (1) (b) was subsequently differently approached in the later decisions. It may be noted also that cl. 34 of the Finance Bill 1968, in its form as amended in committee (Bill No. 171) does not apply to discretionary trusts that are not determinable on death, though created after Mar. 19, 1968, but is confined to negating, in effect, Gartside v. Inland Revenue Comrs. ([1968] 1 All E. R. 121).

B June 19. CROSS, J., read the following judgment: On Nov. 26, 1957, Lord Weir settled £50,000 in contemplation of the marriage of his daughter Elspeth Marjory Jessie, then the widow of a Mr. Cartwright, to Eustace Benyon Hoare. The parties to the settlement were Lord Weir, the settlor; Mr. Hoare (called "the husband"); Mrs. Cartwright (called "the wife"); and James Kenneth Weir and Henry Edmund Sargant as trustees. Clause 1 of the settlement declared that it was made in consideration of the intended marriage, and that it should become void unless the marriage be solemnised before Dec. 31, 1957. By C cl. 2, the expression "the Trustees" was defined as meaning "the original trustees or the survivor of them or other the trustees or trustee for the time being " of the settlement; "the Trust Fund" was defined as "the said sum of £50,000 . . . and the investments and property from time to time representing the same"; and "the Trust Period" was defined as meaning "which ever is the shorter of the following periods namely (i) the period commencing at the date of the solemnisation of the said marriage and continuing until the expiration of a period of eighty years, and (ii) the period commencing at the said date and continuing until the expiration of twenty-one years (less the last day) from the death of the last survivor of all the lineal descendants now living of His Late King George the Fifth". By cl. 3 the trustees were directed to invest the said sum of £50,000 as therein mentioned. Clause 4 read as follows:

E "From and after the solemnisation of the said intended marriage and subject as hereinafter provided the Trustees shall pay or apply the income of the Trust Fund during the Trust Period to or for the maintenance and support or otherwise for the benefit of all or such one or more to the exclusion of the others or other of the Husband and Wife and the children or remoter issue of the said marriage for the time being living as the Trustees (being at least two in number or a trust corporation) in their absolute discretion think fit with power for the Trustees to pay any income which they may decide should be applied for the maintenance or otherwise for the benefit of any child or remoter issue of the said marriage to the guardian or guardians of such child or remoter issue without being bound to see to the application thereof."

G Clause 5 provided that notwithstanding the trusts thereinbefore contained the trustees (being at least two in number or a trust corporation) might at any time or times during the trust period with the consent in writing of Mrs. Hoare during her life and thereafter at the discretion of the trustees transfer the whole or any part of the trust fund to her or to any child or remoter issue of the said intended marriage for his or her absolute use and benefit and might with such consent or at such discretion as aforesaid by deed or deeds revoke all or any of the trusts H and appoint such new trusts of the trust fund or any part or parts thereof in favour of the said Eustace Benyon Hoare, Mrs. Hoare or any child or children or remoter issue of the said intended marriage or in the event of Mrs. Hoare marrying again in favour of any after taken husband of hers and any child or remoter issue of such subsequent marriage subject to a proviso that so long as any child or remoter issue of the said intended marriage should be living the I power of revocation and new appointment in favour of any after taken husband of Mrs. Hoare or any child or remoter issue of any subsequent marriage conferred on the trustees should only extend to one moiety of the trust fund.

By cl. 6, subject to the trusts and powers thereinbefore contained, the trustees were directed to hold the trust fund on trust for such of the children of the said intended marriage as should be living at the expiration of the trust period if more than one in equal shares with a substitution of the issue then living of any child then dead in the place of such child and, if there should be no child or remoter issue of the said intended marriage then living, on the like trusts mutatis mutandis for the children and remoter issue of any subsequent marriage of Mrs. Hoare. A

By cl. 7 it was provided that if the trusts thereinbefore declared should fail or determine then subject to the powers thereby or by law vested in the trustees and to every exercise of such powers the trustees should hold the trust fund on trust for Elizabeth Cartwright (Mrs. Hoare's daughter by her first marriage) and any husband child or remoter issue of Elizabeth as the trustees in their absolute discretion should at any time before the expiration of the trust period by deed or deeds appoint "and in default of and until and subject to any such appointment on trust for the said Elizabeth Armine Julia Cartwright absolutely". B

Mr. and Mrs. Hoare were married on Nov. 29, 1957; they had no children; and Mr. Hoare died on July 9, 1961. None of the powers contained in cl. 5 has been exercised. As the trustees were obliged to distribute the whole income, Mr. and Mrs. Hoare, acting together, could have directed them to deal with each accruing instalment in any way they wished; but subject to any such joint direction—and, so far as I know, none was ever given—it was the duty of the trustees to make up their minds within a reasonable time of the receipt of any income whether to pay it to Mr. Hoare or to Mrs. Hoare. In fact, in exercise of their discretion, they paid all the income to Mrs. Hoare during the joint lives. On Mr. Hoare's death, the trustees ceased to have any discretion to exercise, since Mrs. Hoare was the only surviving object of the trust, and since that date she has received the income as of right. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed estate duty on the whole of the trust fund as passing on the death of Mr. Hoare. C D

The facts are simple enough, but it will not surprise anyone acquainted with this branch of the law to learn that the argument lasted for over four days—during which counsel at all events wasted no words—and that some thirty authorities, many of them in the House of Lords, were referred to. The law of estate duty has indeed now attained a degree of refinement which would have gladdened the heart of Lord St. Leonards. I will begin by setting out those parts of the Finance Act, 1894 (s. 1, s. 2 (1) and s. 7 (7)), which are immediately relevant to this problem. E

"1. In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this Part of this Act, there shall, save as hereinafter expressly provided, be levied and paid, upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person a duty called 'Estate duty' at the graduated rates hereinafter mentioned and the existing duties mentioned in the First Schedule to this Act shall not be levied in respect of property chargeable with such Estate duty. F G

"2 (1). Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say: . . . (b) Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest, ceasing on the death of the deceased, to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest; but exclusive of property the interest in which of the deceased or other person was only an interest as holder of an office, or recipient of the benefits of a charity, or as a corporation sole. H

"7 (7). The value of the benefit accruing or arising from the cesser of an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased shall—(a) if the interest extended to the whole income of the property, be the principal value of that property; and (b) if the interest extended to less than the whole income of the property, be the principal value of an addition to the property equal to the income to which the interest extended." I

During the first sixty years of this century the theory of the relationship between s. 1 and s. 2 of this Act which was generally accepted by the courts was that propounded by LORD MACNAGHTEN in his speech in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). This was that the two sections were mutually exclusive; that any

A property which "passed on the death" in the ordinary sense of the word—a sense which it was left to the courts to determine—passed under s. 1; and that s. 2 (1) was not intended to explain what was meant by the expression "property passing on the death" but was a purely "deeming" section which brought into charge to duty various items of property which could not be said to "pass on the death" in the ordinary sense of the word.

B In Public Trustee v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), the "Arnholz case", the House of Lords rejected this theory. It held that the two sections were not mutually exclusive but that s. 2 (1) was explanatory of s. 1 at least to the extent that an item of property which was chargeable under s. 2 (1), if the words used in the relevant sub-para. were given their ordinary meaning, could not be chargeable under s. 1. But the House left open the question whether the explanation of the

C meaning of "passing on the death" given by s. 2 was exhaustive, or whether s. 1 might itself catch property which did not fall under any of the sub-paragraphs of s. 2 (1) but which the courts might think could nevertheless fairly be said to "pass on the death". I shall have to come back to this question later in this judgment, but in view of the decision in the Arnholz case (2) there can at least be no doubt that a judge should first address his mind to s. 2 (1) and ask himself

D whether the property with which he is concerned falls within any of its sub-paragraphs. In this case, of course, the only relevant sub-paragraph is s. 2 (1) (b),

The question of the application of s. 2 (1) (b) to discretionary trusts was considered by MAUGHAM, L.J., in the case of A.-G. v. Burrell (3). There, under the will of the testator, there was a discretionary trust during the life of "H", the primary beneficiary, for payment of so much of the income as the trustees

E thought fit to or for the benefit of "H" and his wife and children—a class, in the events which happened, of five persons—and after the death of "H" a similar trust during the life of the eldest son "W", the next primary beneficiary, for payment of so much of the income as the trustees should think fit to or for the benefit of another class which consisted immediately after the death of "H" of three persons—"W", his wife and his brother "M", two of whom (namely,

F "W" and "M") had been discretionary objects during the life of "H". So far as the trustees did not distribute the income to one or other of the discretionary objects, it was payable by operation of law to the heir at law or next-of-kin. MAUGHAM, L.J., asked himself first, as he thought LORD MACNAGHTEN's theory obliged him to, whether the trust fund "passed" under s. 1 on the death of "H". This he thought it could only have done if it "changed hands as a whole"

G on that event. Having regard to the fact that two of the discretionary objects were members of both the old class of five and the new class of three, he found it impossible to say that there had been a passing under s. 1, and so he turned to consider s. 2 (1) (b). His remarks on this point are (4):

H "I ask myself whether there has been a cesser of an interest within the meaning of s. 2, sub-s. (1) (b), in the circumstances of the case on the death of Harry. I observe in the forefront of that problem the fact that it is immaterial to determine anything in regard to the property as a whole, since s. 2 (1) (b) will apply to a cesser of an interest. All that is necessary, as I see it, in order that there should be a cesser within the subsection which I am considering is, first, that there should be property in which the deceased or

I any other person must have had an interest ceasing on the death, and, secondly, that there must be a benefit accruing to someone by reason of the cesser of that interest. The section in its first line says: 'Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest'. 'Person' here, of course, would include a class, and I see no objection to regarding the class of persons who during the lifetime of Harry had a discretionary right to share in the income, plus the persons ascertained upon the death of the testator, as being the persons who were the heir and the next of kin, as a composite person.

"In my opinion, then, there was an interest in the whole of the income, belonging to the composite person or composite class, which ceased on the death of Harry, since under the will, as I read it, there is in effect provision that the income of the estate during the lifetime of Harry is to be distributed in the way in which I have mentioned, and on the death of Harry, in the events which have happened, ascertained at the death of Harry, there became a trust during the life of William Reginald to divide or distribute the income according to the discretion of the trustees between William Reginald, his wife and his children, if any (he has none at the present time), and the balance to the heir-at-law and the next of kin of the original testator.

"The next question which I have to ask myself is: Has a benefit accrued or arisen by reason of the cesser of such interest to someone? The section does not say to whom. In my opinion a benefit has accrued or arisen, by reason of the cesser of the interest to which I have referred, for the benefit of the new class, consisting of William Reginald, his wife, his children (if any), and possible other persons, and the balance again has to go to the heir-at-law and the next-of-kin of the testator. There is nothing in the subsection I am considering from which a conclusion can, I think, properly be drawn to show that the persons to whom the benefit accrues may not be to some extent persons who had an interest prior to the death of the deceased. The new class is a different class, the benefit which accrues to members of the new class, discretionary I agree, is yet a benefit which accrues to them by reason of a different trust and a different relationship to the original testator.

"These considerations would no doubt lead me to say that the property passed within s. 1 if it were not for the doubt I have whether it can fairly be said that the property as a whole changed hands. Under s. 2 (1) (b), I have not any trouble such as that which confronts me under s. 1, and I say, regarding the class of beneficiaries before the death of Harry as a single composite person, their interest has ceased and a benefit has accrued to the new class of beneficiaries as a whole, so that the case comes within the words of cl. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 2."

LORD HANWORTH, M.R., agreed with MAUGHAM, L.J., but ROMER, L.J., thought that the property passed under s. 1. His view of the matter was approved by the House of Lords (Burrell v. A.-G. (5)), and LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, who delivered the only speech, did not indicate whether, if he had not thought that s. 1 applied, he would have agreed with MAUGHAM, L.J., in thinking that s. 2 (1) (b) could be made to fit this case.

Since the decision in the Arnholz case (6), references in judgments to s. 2 (1) (b) have naturally become more frequent than they were previously, but until the recent decision of the House of Lords in Gartside v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (7) there was not, so far as I know, any dissent expressed from MAUGHAM, L.J.'s view that the subsection could be applied to discretionary trusts by treating all the objects as a composite class possessed of a single interest in the income of the fund which ceased on the death, which put an end to the current discretionary trust (see, for example, RUSSELL, L.J., in Re Kirkwood (8); and LORD GUEST in the same case in the House of Lords (9)).

A The facts in the Gartside case (10) were that by his will a testator gave a share of his residuary estate to trustees upon trust:

B “ (i) to apply the income of the fund at their discretion for the maintenance or benefit of all or any of his son, his son’s wife or children (if any), and to accumulate surplus income as an addition to capital with power at any time to resort to the accumulations and to apply them as current income; (ii) after the son’s death, to hold the capital, income and accumulations upon trust for such of the son’s children who being male attained twenty-one or being female attained that age or married, and if more than one equally; and (iii) to advance at any time to the grandchildren of the testator sums of up to one-half of the presumptive or vested share of that grandchild in the fund.”

C The question for decision was whether the testator’s grandsons to whom advances had been made about a year before their father’s death had “interests in possession” in the fund within the meaning of s. 43 of the Finance Act, 1940 (11). In the course of discussing the nature of the rights of objects of a discretionary trust, LORD REID (12) commented on what I may call the “group” theory as follows:

E “There are in some of the cases indications of a view that, while each of the objects of a discretionary trust has an interest in the trust fund, this interest does not extend to the whole or any part of the interest accruing from the fund. But, on the other hand, all the objects together have a single class or group interest which does extend to the whole interest of the fund. Counsel for the respondents in the clear and well-reasoned argument expressly declined to adopt that view and I think he was well advised in taking that course. Where a number of persons are members of a company or other incorporation which has a separate legal personality, the incorporation can, of course, have a single right different from the rights of any of its members. But otherwise two or more persons cannot have a single right unless they hold it jointly or in common. But clearly objects of a discretionary trust do not have that: they each have individual rights: they are in competition with each other and what the trustees give to one is his alone.”

G LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST and LORD GUEST concurred in the speech of LORD REID. LORD WILBERFORCE, with whose speech LORD HODSON concurred, did not say anything about the “composite class” theory, but there is nothing in his speech to indicate that he dissented in any way from LORD REID’s view. I do not think that that view was part of the ratio decidendi of the Gartside case (10), but even if I disagreed with it I would hesitate to dissent from it. In fact, however, if I may say so, I agree with it entirely. The objects of a discretionary trust—together if there is a power of accumulation with those interested in capital—may no doubt be said to be collectively the persons interested in the income as it accrues before the trustees have decided how to deal with it. But they do not have concurrent interests in the income. They have separate interests in it which are individually unquantifiable, though added together they cover the whole. In the immediately following passage in his speech LORD REID pointed out that the considerations applying to discretionary trusts under which the trustees have to distribute all the income may not be in all respects the same as those applicable to discretionary trusts under which there is a power to add income to capital instead of distributing it. I shall have to come back to this distinction in a moment; but I do not think that LORD REID was intending to suggest that the distinction was relevant to his discussion of the “group” theory. Even if the trust is exhaustive and there is no power to withhold income the objects have individual competing interests, not concurrent interests in the income. A

Indeed, counsel on both sides accepted that in seeking to apply s. 2 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1894, to the facts of this case it could not be suggested that Mr. and Mrs. Hoare formed a group which had a single interest in the income ceasing on the death of Mr. Hoare, but that the argument must proceed on the footing that such interests as they may have had during their joint lives were separate competing interests. On that footing, counsel for the taxpayers submitted that Mr. Hoare had an interest in the income of the trust fund which ceased on his death, and that on his death a benefit accrued or arose to Mrs. Hoare by reason of its cesser. The property therefore passed to the extent of the benefit. As the value of the benefit could not be quantified, no duty was payable; but the fact that there was a claim—albeit a valueless claim—for duty under s. 2 (1) (b) precluded any separate claim under s. 1, assuming such a claim to be possible in any case. Counsel for the Crown, on the other hand, submitted that Mr. Hoare and Mrs. Hoare both had interests in the income of the fund which ceased on the death of Mr. Hoare; that the cesser of their two interests caused two benefits to accrue or arise; and that in applying s. 7 (7) to the case one could add the two interests ceasing together so as to arrive at a benefit extending to the whole income of the property. B C D

These arguments have to be considered in the light of the Gartside case (13). In that case, over and above what LORD REID said about the “group” theory, two points were decided. They were (a) that the discretionary objects in the case before the House had not anything which could fairly be described as an “interest”—and a fortiori not an “interest in possession”—in the income of the fund, and (b) that no interest can be an interest ceasing on death within the meaning of s. 2 (1) (b) unless it extends either to the whole income of the property or to a defined part of the income of the property (see on this latter point LORD REID (14) and LORD WILBERFORCE (15)). E

Now it is true that both LORD REID and LORD WILBERFORCE, who delivered the only speeches, stressed the fact that they were dealing with a discretionary trust under which the trustees were not bound to distribute all the income but could accumulate any or all of it, and expressly reserved the question whether their decision would apply to what one may call an exhaustive discretionary trust, such as this is, under which all the income has to be distributed as it accrues. I can well see that this distinction may have a bearing on point (a). If Mr. and Mrs. Hoare had assigned to a third party all the income of the trust fund to accrue during their joint lives and the life of the survivor or the earlier birth of a child of the marriage, the trustees would have been obliged to pay this income to the third party during that period. One might, I suppose, regard Mr. and Mrs. Hoare as having something analogous to a joint power over the income in question without any underlying property in the income; but it is certainly more natural to regard each of them as having an interest in an undefined portion of the income ceasing on the death of Mr. Hoare. F G H

In view of the reservations in the Gartside case (13) with regard to exhaustive discretionary trusts, I would be prepared to hold that Mr. Hoare had something which could sensibly be described as an interest ceasing on his death in the income of the fund. But the view expressed both by LORD REID and by LORD WILBERFORCE that s. 2 (1) (b) has no application to any interests ceasing on death which are not interests either in the whole or a measurable part of the income of the fund must, as I see it, exclude interests under exhaustive discretionary trusts from the ambit of s. 2 (1) (b) just as much as it excludes “non-exhaustive” discretionary trusts. The presence or absence of a power of or a trust for accumulation of undistributed income seems to be irrelevant to the question of construction I

A of the section. If this is so, then the argument for the taxpayer under s. 2 (1) (b) must fail because Mr. Hoare had no such interest ceasing on his death as is contemplated by the sub-paragraph.

The argument for the Crown on this branch of the case is open to various further objections. Assuming that Mrs. Hoare's interest under the discretionary trust during the joint lives can be described as an interest ceasing on the death of Mr. Hoare when it was enlarged into a pure life interest, I am unable to see how any benefit accrued in respect of the cesser of that interest over and above the benefit which accrued on the death of Mr. Hoare on the cesser of his own interest. That interest, taken by itself, was not within the sub-paragraph because the benefit arising on its cesser was not measurable.

Further, even if there were two benefits arising, I cannot see how one could amalgamate the two cessers and the two benefits so as to produce a single benefit extending to the whole income. To do so would be to introduce the exploded "group" theory by a back door. As I see it, the House of Lords, by rejecting the "group" theory and by holding that no interest is within s. 2 (1) (b) unless it is an interest in the whole or a defined part of the income, has in effect held that s. 2 (1) (b) is inapplicable to interests under discretionary trusts both on the death of a single object of a continuing trust and on the death of someone, whether an object or not, on which the trust is brought to an end.

I turn now to the claim under s. 1, assuming for the time being that a claim under s. 1 in circumstances which do not fall under any head in s. 2 is possible. On this aspect of the case the Crown relied on the Burrell case (16), to which I have referred, and also and more particularly on Scott v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (17). In the Scott case (17) the essential facts were that by the joint effect of a number of documents the Cadogan estates were held during the life of the sixth earl, who succeeded to the title in 1915, on discretionary trusts for the benefit of the sixth earl, his wife, his children and remoter issue, and subject thereto on trust to accumulate the income for the discharge of incumbrances, and after the death of the sixth earl, which occurred in 1933, for his son the seventh earl as tenant in tail in possession. There it was held that the whole property passed on the death of the sixth earl under s. 1 notwithstanding the fact that the seventh earl had been an object of the discretionary trust during his father's lifetime. Here, the commissioners argued, there was a discretionary trust during the joint lives of Mr. and Mrs. Hoare followed on the death of Mr. Hoare by a life interest to Mrs. Hoare, and the fact that Mrs. Hoare was an object of the discretionary trust during her husband's lifetime could not prevent the trust fund from passing on Mr. Hoare's death. In this case, of course, Mrs. Hoare was the primary object of the discretionary trust during the joint lives and was in fact the sole recipient of all the income, but the Crown contended that this could not make any difference in principle, and counsel for the taxpayer was, I think, disposed to agree that it did not.

The ground, or at all events the chief ground, on which counsel for the taxpayers sought to distinguish the Scott (17) and Burrell (16) cases was that in them there were two entirely separate trusts—one operating before the death, the other taking its place after the death—whereas here cl. 4 of the settlement declared a single discretionary trust. If there are three objects of a discretionary trust and one dies, admittedly no duty is payable. Why should duty become payable when one of two objects dies? To reinforce his argument, counsel relied strongly on a passage in the judgment of RUSSELL, L.J., in the Kirkwood case which reads as follows (18):

"I think in this connexion that while mere form may not be a deciding factor in the incidence of estate duty, methods adopted may be. If under a settlement the settlor creates in terms during the life of A a discretionary trust of income for such of A, B, C, D and E as should from time to time be living and the issue of any who should be dead, and then proceeds to declare from and after the death of A a further discretionary trust of income until a further occasion for such of B, C, D and E as should from time to time be living and the issue of any who should be dead and the issue of A, estate duty would be chargeable on A's death. But if he had adopted ab initio the method of a discretionary trust until that further occasion for such of A, B, C, D and E as should from time to time be living and the issue of any who should be dead, estate duty would not be chargeable on A's death."

Here, said counsel, although the trust might have been framed in such a way as to cause a passing on the death of Mrs. Hoare, framed as it was there was no such passing. I cannot accept that argument. It is true that cl. 4 says that the discretion of the trustees as to the payment or application of the income is to extend throughout the trust period, but in fact it would necessarily end not only when there were no longer any objects in existence but also during such periods as there was only one object. On Mr. Hoare's death the trustees ceased to have any discretion but became bound to pay the income to Mrs. Hoare. To make sense of the clause one must really read in after the words "in their absolute discretion think fit" some such words as "so long as there are at least two objects and during such period or periods as there are only one pay the income to that one".

This consideration seems to me to distinguish this case from the type of case envisaged by RUSSELL, L.J. Here, one is not re-writing the clause in order to give a life interest to Mrs. Hoare as from the death of Mr. Hoare. The clause itself, properly construed, gives her such a life interest and by no ingenuity could it have been framed in a way which did not produce this result. Consequently, I think that this case is on all fours with the Scott case (19).

I turn now to consider whether there can in fact be a passing under s. 1 of the Act in circumstances not falling within any of the heads of s. 2 (1). In the Arnholz case (20), LORD SIMONDS and LORD RADCLIFFE, who gave the leading speeches, both pointed out how unlikely it was that Parliament, when it enacted the Finance Act, 1894, would have failed to explain what it meant by the novel expression "property passing on the death". They rejected LORD MACNAGHTEN'S view as to the limited scope of the word "deemed", pointing out that it could properly be used to include not only the impossible but also the obvious and the uncertain. Approaching s. 2 (1) in that way, they were able to give the words in paras. 1 (a) and (b) their natural wide meaning and not the forced narrow meaning given to them by LORD MACNAGHTEN. Thus para. (a) instead of being confined to the case of an unexercised general power of appointment, covered as well all property to which the deceased was absolutely entitled, and para. (b), instead of being confined to the cesser on death of charges on income, covered the cesser of all forms of life interest. Paragraph (c) brings into charge property which, having been given away before the death, does not "pass" on the death in any ordinary sense of the word at all. Paragraph (d) brings into charge types of property which some people might think did and others might think did not pass on the death in the ordinary sense of the word. Thus paras. (a) and (b) are examples of the obvious and cover all the ordinary cases; para. (c) is an example of the impossible, and para. (d) of the uncertain.

The natural conclusion to draw from this method of approach would be that s. 2 provided an exhaustive explanation, by inclusion and exclusion, of the property which was to be charged with the duty granted by s. 1, as indeed the marginal note says it does. Moreover, although he reserved the point, I think that LORD SIMONDS, at any rate, thought that the explanation was exhaustive. Thus he said (21):

(19) [1936] 3 All E.R. 752; [1937] A.C. 174.

(21) [1960] 1 All E.R. at p. 4; [1960] A.C. at p. 408.

A “My lords, if I were today looking at this Act for the first time, I should say that these sections were straightforward and clear, the first section imposing the charge in general terms and the second defining by inclusion and exclusion the precise area of that charge.”

B Indeed, to hold that s. 2 explains the meaning of “passing on the death” in s. 2 (1) but does not explain it exhaustively would be to attribute to Parliament a most unlikely intention—far more unlikely than that attributed to it by LORD MACNAGHTEN. If I may use homely language, Parliament on this view would be saying to the taxpayer and the revenue authorities: “You have never heard the words ‘passing on the death’ before. You will, of course, need help as to their meaning, and that help we are giving you in s. 2 (1). Paragraph (a) and (b) cover all the ordinary cases, and you might very likely have concluded that they were included even if we had given no explanation and had left s. 1 to stand alone. Paragraph (c) includes a case which you would certainly never have thought was included. Paragraph (d) covers cases which you might or might not have thought were included. No doubt there may be other borderline cases where some people might think the property ‘passed’ on the death while others might not. As we say nothing about any other borderline cases, you might naturally suppose that they are not in any event to be included, but you would be wrong. We wish the question—ex hypothesi it will be a difficult question—whether any other borderline case is or is not included to be decided by the courts in proceedings which will probably go up to the House of Lords without any help from us.” It would be ironic indeed if the endeavour made by the House of Lords in the Arnholz case (22) to put a rational construction on s. 1 and s. 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, were to end in their being construed in so totally irrational a fashion.

E I turn now to consider whether there is anything in the cases decided since the Arnholz case (22) which would preclude me from holding that there can be no passing under s. 1 in circumstances which do not fall under any head in s. 2 (1). I do not think that there is, for the point has never been argued. In some cases, judges have assumed that a separate claim under s. 1 was possible—LORD REID so assumed in the Gartside case (23)—but sometimes judges have expressly envisaged the possibility that no such claim could be made (see, for example, per RUSSELL, L.J., in the Kirkwood case (24)). There has apparently been only one case in which it made a difference to the result whether s. 1 or s. 2 (1) (b) applied. That was the case of Re Harris (25); but there counsel who was contending for the application of s. 2 (1) (b) did not argue that a passing under s. 1 alone was impossible.

G If, therefore, the matter rested there I would, I think, have been able to give effect to my own view of the matter and hold that any claim by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under s. 1 alone must fail. But the matter does not rest there. Although the claim of the commissioners is far less meritorious in this case than it was in the Burrell (26) and Scott (27) cases, I cannot (as I have said) draw any distinction in principle between those cases and this case. Further, the decisions in those cases are clearly binding on me. It is no doubt true that in deciding those cases under s. 1 alone the House of Lords was taking a view of the relationship of s. 1 and s. 2 (1) which must now be considered to have been to some extent at least erroneous, and if I could see that the same result could have been achieved under s. 2 (1) (b) I might be prepared to view them as decisions in which the right result was reached for the wrong reason. But, as I have already said, the decision in the Gartside case (23) as I read it shows that s. 2 (1) (b) is not applicable to the cesser of a discretionary trust.

(27) [1936] 3 All E.R. 752; [1937] A.C. 174.

The truth, as I see it, is that Parliament in 1894, in giving an exhaustive explanation of what it meant by "passing on the death", failed to take discretionary trusts into account at all, either from the point of view of the death of one object of a continuing trust or from the point of view of the cesser of the discretionary trust as a whole on some death. It is not in the least surprising that Parliament should have been guilty of this omission, for in 1894 it must have been rare for a testator or settlor to create an immediate discretionary trust of income. But though no doubt it would be open to the House of Lords to give effect to this view—if they shared it—and so force the authorities to undertake the task of recasting this part at least of the law of estate duty, it is certainly not open to me to give effect to it. All that I can do is to say that in view of the Burrell (28) and Scott (29) cases I am bound to hold that duty is payable, but that in view of the Arnholz (30) and Gartside (31) decisions I can find no satisfactory reason why duty should be payable.

Following the sale of two of its four mills under a Government scheme for reduction of capacity and modernisation in the cotton spinning industry, a cotton spinning company (to which s. 23 of the Finance Act, 1960, applied) had the right to compensation of £112,976 in respect of the mills and machinery disposed of, but became liable to a levy of £58,986. At that time the company's issued share capital consisted of £284,235 ordinary stock. It had assets, realisable on a liquidation, of £1 million or £3 10s. for each £1 of stock, revenue reserved (in the previous year) of £594,929, and an excess of cash, tax reserve certificates and a market value of investments over current liabilities, including taxation provision, of £228,696. The reduction in its production capacity and increasing use of man-made fibres (ordered monthly instead of six-monthly with cotton, resulting in a lower holding of stocks) had reduced the requirement for working capital, and the company had money surplus to requirements. It was decided to repay £284,235 to stockholders (equal to the amount of stock issued) as surplus to the company's requirements and by way of reduction of capital. To enable

A that to be done it was decided to capitalise certain funds and issue bonus shares; the sole purpose of these was to put the company in a position to pay out the £284,235 by way of reduction of capital. Tax considerations were borne in mind in deciding on the method, and in particular the surtax liability which would have fallen on stockholders if the payment were made by way of dividend. Thus the company resolved in November, 1959, on

B sub-division of its shares into 5s. ordinary shares and—(i) to capitalise £189,490 made up of £129,490 part of the balance of profits (in the profit and loss account) and £60,000 (in a capital redemption reserve fund), and (ii) to distribute that sum as a bonus in the form of 757,960 ordinary shares of 5s. each to existing stockholders. In the result the issued share capital of the company became £473,725 ordinary stock.

C About a year later the company resolved on reduction and increase of capital—(a) to reduce the capital from £473,725 ordinary stock to £234,842 10s. by returning 12s. for every £1 of that stock and reducing the nominal amount of every £1 of it to 8s.; and (b) to increase the capital of the company again to £519,077 10s. by creating 1,136,940 new ordinary shares of 5s. each. Stockholders received £284,235 under the resolution. H., a stockholder,

D received £24,022 10s. and his wife (not separately assessed to tax) received £7,500. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue served notices on both stockholders under s. 28* of the Finance Act, 1960, specifying in the case of the first stockholder certain adjustments of the computation of his liability to surtax as being requisite for counteracting tax advantages obtained by him, and in the case of his wife certain adjustments to the computation of F “(1) Where—(a) in any such circumstances as are mentioned in the next following subsection, and (b) in consequence of a transaction in securities or of the combined effect of two or more such transactions, a person is in a position to obtain, or has obtained a tax advantage, then unless he shows that the transaction or transactions were carried out either for bona fide commercial reasons or in the ordinary course of making or managing investments, and that none of them has as their main object, or one of their main objects, to enable tax advantages to be obtained, this section shall apply to him in respect of that transaction or those transactions . . .

E the joint total income of her husband and herself as being requisite for counteracting tax advantages obtained by her. On appeal, the Special

G “(2) The circumstances mentioned in the foregoing subsection are that— . . . (c) the person in question receives, in consequence of a transaction whereby any other person— (i) subsequently receives, or has received, an abnormal amount by way of dividend; or (ii) subsequently becomes entitled, or has become entitled, to a deduction as mentioned in para. (b) of this subsection, a consideration which either is, or represents the value of, assets which are (or apart from anything done by the company in question would have been) available for distribution by way of dividend, or is received in respect of future receipts of the company or is, or represents the value of, trading stock of the company, and the said person so receives the consideration that he does not pay or bear tax on it as income; or (d) in connection with the distribution of profits of a company to which this paragraph applies, the person in question so receives as is mentioned in para. (c) of this subsection such a consideration as is therein mentioned. In this subsection—(i) references to profits include references to income, reserves or other assets, (ii) references to distribution include references to transfer or realisation (including application in discharge of liabilities), and (iii) references to the receipt of consideration include references to the receipt of any money or money's worth, but the assets mentioned in para. (c) of this subsection do not include assets which (while of a description which under the law of the country in which the company is incorporated is available for distribution by way of dividend) are shown to represent a return of sums paid by

I “(3) Where this section applies to a person in respect of any transaction or transactions, the tax advantage obtained or obtainable by him in consequence thereof shall be counteracted by such of the following adjustments, that is to say an assessment or additional assessment, the nullifying of a right to repayment or the requiring of the return of a repayment already made (the amount to be returned being chargeable under Case VI of Sch. D and recoverable accordingly), or the computation or recomputation of profits or gains, or liability to tax, on such basis as the Commissioners of Inland Revenue may specify by notice in writing served on him as being requisite for counteracting the tax advantage so obtainable or obtained.”

Commissioners found, among other findings, that enabling tax advantage to be obtained was one of the main objects of the transactions. They also found that Mrs. H. was not in a position to obtain and had not obtained a tax advantage.

Held: (i) under s. 28 (1) of the Finance Act, 1960, the onus was on the taxpayer to show that his case fell within exempting conditions stated in the subsection, and, as it was impossible to maintain that the commissioners could not reasonably have reached the conclusion that one of the main objects of the transactions was enabling tax advantage to be obtained, the notice served on the first taxpayer should stand (see p. 1260, letter I, p. 1262 letter F, and p. 1264, letter H, post).

(ii) the appropriate fraction of the repayment of capital by the company to H. which was attributable to the tax advantage obtained by H. was 129,490/284,235 and not 129,490/473,725 as determined in the court below, the denominator being the amount distributed and not the then capital of the company (see p. 1261, letter B, p. 1263, letter G, and p. 1264, letter H, post).

(iii) the second taxpayer, H.'s wife, had not received any tax advantage (as defined in s. 43 (4) (g)*) for the purposes of s. 28 (3) of the Act of 1960, since she, being a married woman living with her husband, was not assessable to income tax, and the first taxpayer, her husband, could not be charged because there had been no receipt by him of the capital repayment in respect of his wife's shares, as that had been paid to her, so that the relevant requirement of s. 28 (2) was not satisfied and the notice served on her should be cancelled (see p. 1261, letter F, p. 1262, letter C, and p. 1264, letters C and H, post).

Appeal.

Notice under s. 28 of the Finance Act, 1960†, had been served by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue on the first taxpayer, Mr. W. T. Hague, and like notice had been so served on the second taxpayer, his wife. Each notice specified adjustments in the computation of the first taxpayer's total income (or the taxpayers' joint total income) for surtax purposes for the year 1960/61 as being requisite for counteracting tax advantage obtained by him or her. Each taxpayer had appealed separately to the Commissioners for Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts under s. 28 (6). From their decision in the appeal of the first * Section 43 (4), so far as relevant, provided: "(f) 'securities' include shares, 'shares', except where the context otherwise requires, includes stock, and references to dividends include references to interest; (g) 'tax advantage' means a relief or increased relief from, or repayment or increased repayment of, income tax, or the avoidance or reduction of an assessment to income tax or the avoidance of a possible assessment thereto, whether the avoidance or reduction is effected by receipts accruing in such a way that the recipient does not pay or bear tax on them, or by a deduction in computing profits or gains."

A taxpayer he appealed to the High Court, and from their decision in the appeal of the second taxpayer the Crown appealed to the High Court. The facts found in the Cases Stated were substantially similar. The following passages in the Case Stated in the appeal of the first taxpayer, Mr. Hague, were read by DANCKWERTS, L.J., in his judgment—

B “2. Shortly stated, the questions for our determination were: (i) whether certain transactions in securities by Hagues Textiles, Ltd. (hereinafter called ‘the company’) were carried out for bona fide commercial reasons and whether none of them had as their main object, or one of their main objects, to enable tax advantages to be obtained; (ii) whether certain distributions by the company represented a return of sums paid by subscribers on the issue of securities within s. 28 (2) (iii) [of the Finance Act, 1960].

C “4. (1) The company was incorporated in 1945 to purchase and acquire the businesses of three cotton spinning companies, and it has since carried on business as cotton and artificial fibre spinners. At all material times it was a company to which para. (d) of s. 28 (2) [of the Act of 1960] applied.

D “(2) Originally, the company operated five mills. One (Stockfield Mill) was sold in 1954, leaving the company with Orb Mill, Vale Mill, Hawthorn Mill and Ram Mill. During the 1950’s the company recognised that it needed to modernise and re-equip its mills; the necessary re-equipment would require large resources which the company could not command, and the directors had in contemplation cutting down capacity and concentrating on Ram Mill, which was the most modern.

E “(3) In May, 1959, a government White Paper was published containing proposals for a reduction of capacity in the industry generally, a plan for compensation for machinery scrapped, a subsidy for modernisation, and a levy. The directors of the company welcomed this and despite the opposition of some of the stockholders (see sub-para. (4) below) Orb Mill and Vale Mill were disposed of, part of their machinery being transferred to Ram Mill, which was re-equipped by scrapping mules and substituting ring spindles. Hawthorn Mill was kept in operation being considered to have some useful years of life left. The company received compensation under the Cotton Industry Act, 1959, amounting to £112,976 in respect of the mills and machinery disposed of; it also became liable to levies under the Act which, in the event, totalled £58,986.

G “(4) During the discussions concerning the re-organisation of the company’s business some of the stockholders (who numbered thirty-two in all) were in favour of putting the company into liquidation; it was estimated that the total amount realisable on a liquidation would be about £1m, which would represent nearly £3 10s. for each £1 of stock. The majority of the directors however considered that rationalisation would produce further profits.

H “(5) The company’s balance sheet as at Apr. 4, 1959, shows revenue reserves of £594,929. The total of its cash (in hand or at bank), tax reserve certificates and the market value of its investments exceeded its current liabilities (including taxation provision) by £252,885; the corresponding figure as at Apr. 2, 1960, was £228,696. In addition the company anticipated receiving about £112,000 compensation, against which it would have to set the levies becoming payable. The reduction in capacity, together with a gradually increasing use of man-made fibres (which it can order monthly instead of six monthly as is the case for cotton, resulting in lower holding of stocks) reduced the requirement for working capital. The company thus had money surplus to its requirements.

I “(6) It was decided that £284,235 should be paid out to stockholders, such money being surplus to the company’s requirements. This sum was equal to the amount of stock then issued (see para. 5 (2) below). It was further decided that this payment should be made by a return of money to stockholders in a reduction of capital; to enable this to be done it was arranged first to capitalise certain funds and issue bonus shares (to be converted when issued into stock). The details of what was done are set out in para. 5 below.

"(7) At the time when this was arranged, there was no question of the company either requiring further capital, or being over-capitalised. The sole purpose of capitalisation and issue of bonus shares was to put the company into a position to pay out £284,235 by means of a reduction of capital, and the sole purpose of reducing the capital was to pay over to stockholders money which was considered surplus to the company's requirements. There was no question of paying out the money by way of dividend because that course would have attracted surtax in the hands of the stockholders, and for that reason it was rejected. It was not disputed that tax considerations were borne in mind when the decision as to how the matter should be arranged was made.

"(8) The decisions were communicated to the stockholders in two letters by the chairman*.

"5. (1) Shortly after its incorporation, the issued capital of the company consisted of £60,000 redeemable preference stock and £378,980 ordinary stock. In 1950, £94,745 was repaid to the ordinary stockholders consequent upon a reduction of capital whereby 2s. 6d. in each 10s. of stock held by them was repaid, leaving £284,235 ordinary stock in issue.

"(2) Immediately prior to the meeting of the company referred to in sub-para. (3) below the authorised capital of the company consisted of £60,000 redeemable preference stock, £284,235 ordinary stock in units of 7s. 6d. each, £174,842 10s. in 349,685 10s. ordinary shares, which were unissued. This totals £519,077 10s. The £60,000 preference stock had been redeemed, and the issued capital therefore consisted of £284,235 ordinary stock. There was a capital redemption reserve fund of £60,000.

"(3) At an extraordinary general meeting of the company held on Nov. 25, 1959, the following resolutions were passed: 1. That each of the existing unissued ordinary shares of 10s. each in the capital of the company be sub-divided into two shares of 5s. each. 2. That the £60,000 unclassified capital (resulting from the redemption of £60,000 five per cent. uncumulative redeemable preference stock) be classified as 240,000 ordinary shares of 5s. each. 3. That it is desirable to capitalise the sum of £189,490 being as to £129,490 [that is an important sum] part of the undivided profits of the company standing to the credit of the company's profit and loss account and as to £60,000 the capital redemption reserve fund and accordingly that such sum of £189,490 made up as aforesaid be distributed as a bonus amongst the persons who on Nov. 2, 1959, were the holders of ordinary stock of the company, and that such bonus be not paid in cash, but be applied on behalf of such stockholders in payment in full for 757,960 ordinary shares of the company of 5s. each and that such ordinary shares credited as fully paid up be accordingly allotted to such stockholders respectively in the proportion of one of such shares for every 7s. 6d. of ordinary stock then held by such stockholders respectively, and such distribution shall be accepted by such stockholders in full satisfaction of their interest in the said capitalised sum. 4. That the said 757,960 ordinary shares in the capital of the company when issued fully paid up be converted into ordinary stock.

"(4) At an extraordinary general meeting of the company held on Nov. 9,

* These two letters were exhibited to the Case Stated.

A 1960, the following special resolutions were passed: 1. That the capital of the company be reduced from £519,077 10s. divided into £473,725 ordinary stock and 181,410 ordinary shares of 5s. each to £234,842 10s. divided into £189,490 ordinary stock and 181,410 ordinary shares of 5s. each and that such reduction be effected by returning to the holders of the £473,725
B ordinary stock capital paid up on such stock to the extent of 12s. for every £1 ordinary stock held by them (being capital in excess of the wants of the company) and by reducing the nominal amount of every £1 of ordinary stock from £1 to 8s. 2. That immediately and contingently upon such reduction of capital taking effect, the capital of the company be increased to its former amount of £519,077 10s. by the creation of the 1,136,940 new ordinary shares of 5s. each.

C "The reduction of capital was confirmed by the court on Nov. 28, 1960.

"(5) The amount returned to stockholders pursuant to this resolution was £284,235.

"6. (1) Prior to the resolution of November, 1959, [the first taxpayer] held £24,022 10s. stock, and consequent thereto there was allotted to him 64,060 shares, which were converted into £16,015 stock (bringing his holding D to £40,037 10s. stock). Upon the reduction of capital in November, 1960, he received £24,022 10s., being 12s. for every £1 of stock held by him.

"(3) The method of calculation of the adjustments to [the first taxpayer's] liability to surtax for 1960-61 set out in the notice was not in issue between the parties."

E In the appeal to the commissioners by the second taxpayer, Mrs. Hague, the commissioners found (para. 6 (1), (2)) that she was at all relevant times a married woman living with her husband, and was not separately assessed to surtax. Prior to the resolution of November, 1959, she held £7,500 stock, and consequent thereto there was allotted to her twenty thousand shares, which were converted into £5,000 stock (bringing her holding to £12,500 stock). On the reduction of capital in November, 1960, she received £7,500, being 12s. for every £1 of stock held by her.

F The commissioners further found that the method of calculation of the adjustments to the computation of joint total income set out in the notice under s. 28 of the Act of 1960 was not in issue between the parties.

The contention of the taxpayers before the commissioners were as follows—

G "7. It was contended on behalf of [the first taxpayer] (i) that the £284,235 paid to stockholders pursuant to the resolution of November, 1960, represented a return of sums paid by subscribers on the issue of securities within s. 28 (2) (iii), in as much as prior to the resolution of November 1959, £284,235 stock was issued, and that accordingly the notice should be cancelled; (ii) that the transactions detailed in the notice were carried out for bona fide commercial reasons and that none of them had, as their main object or one
H of their main objects, to enable tax advantages to be obtained and that accordingly the notice should be cancelled."

The same contentions, mutatis mutandis, were advanced before the commissioners on behalf of the second taxpayer, Mrs. Hague, and in addition —

I "that [the second taxpayer] had not obtained any tax advantage in consequence of the transactions in question; and s. 28 [of the Finance Act, 1960] accordingly had no application to her and that the notice should be cancelled."

It was contended before the commissioners on behalf of the Crown:

"8. (1) That the transactions were not carried out for bona fide commercial reasons; (2) that the main object, or one of the main objects, of the transactions was to enable tax advantages to be obtained; (3) that it had not been shown that, in the case of [the first taxpayer] the money paid to him . . . represented a return of sums paid by them on the issue of securities; (4) that such part of the £284,235 paid out to stockholders as did not exceed the sum capitalised pursuant to the resolution of November, 1959, did not represent a return of sums paid by subscribers on the issue of securities; and (5) that the notice should be confirmed."

The contentions of the Crown before the commissioners in the appeal of the second taxpayer were the same except for (3) above, which did not apply, and in addition the Crown contended that the second taxpayer had obtained a tax advantage in consequence of the transactions.

The findings of the commissioners in the appeal of the first taxpayer were as follows:

"9. We found that the occasion which gave rise to the transactions in question was the reorganisation of the company's business, which would result in the company having assets surplus to its requirements; a further consideration influencing the company's directors was the preference expressed by some stockholders for a liquidation, it being expected that a payment out would satisfy them. Looking at the transactions broadly, their main purpose was to pay out surplus money to stockholders and this was achieved by a bonus issue followed by a return of capital. Section 28, however, required us (in our opinion) to ask ourselves whether it had been shown that none of the transactions detailed in the notice had as their main object, or one of their main objects, to enable tax advantages to be obtained. We concluded that this had not been shown. It was not disputed that a tax advantage was obtained, and looking at all the evidence we found that enabling such advantages to be obtained was one of the main objects of the transactions. We held that so much of the money paid to stockholders as did not exceed the sum capitalised pursuant to the resolution of November, 1959, did not represent a return of sums paid by subscribers on the issue of securities. We confirmed the notice."

In the appeal of the second taxpayer the commissioners found also as follows—

"We held, however, that Mrs. Hague [the second taxpayer] was not a person who was in a position to obtain or had obtained a tax advantage within the meaning of s. 28. In our view the reference in the section to a person who 'has obtained' a tax advantage must, in the context, mean a person who has obtained it for himself or herself, and [the second taxpayer] was not such a person by reason of a tax advantage having accrued not to her but to her husband. We accordingly cancelled the notice*."

On Dec. 21, 1967, Cross, J., as reported at [1968] 1 All E.R. 1096, upheld the commissioners' finding that the first taxpayer had obtained a tax advantage and that the notice served on him was valid, but quantified his tax advantage at the fraction of the capital repayment to him expressed by the figures 129,490/473,725. Cross, J., further held that the second taxpayer, Mrs. Hague, was liable to be served with a notice under s. 28 of the Finance Act, 1960.

Mrs. Hague, the first taxpayer, appealed for an order that the order of Cross, J., be set aside or varied with effect that the determination of the commissioners be set aside and the notice served on him under the Finance Act, 1960, s. 28, be cancelled. The order of Cross, J., had allowed the appeal by the first taxpayer from the determination of the commissioners and remitted the case to them to vary the notice. The Crown appealed for the affirmation of the determination of the commissioners and the restoration of the notice in the form in which it was served on the first taxpayer.

Mrs. Hague, the second taxpayer, appealed for an order that the order of Cross, J., be reversed or varied. The order had allowed an appeal by the Crown from the determination of the commissioners and remitted the case to the commissioners to restore and vary the notice served on the second taxpayer

* The power to cancel is conferred by s. 28 (9) of the Finance Act, 1960.

A under the Finance Act, 1960, s. 28 (which the commissioners by their determination had cancelled). The Crown appealed for the variation of the order of Cross, J., and for an order that the notice be restored in the form in which it was served and be not varied.

DANCKWERTS, L.J.: These are appeals from a judgment of Cross, J. (1), dated Dec. 21, 1967, which affirmed in part and reversed in part the determinations of the Special Commissioners. A Case was stated by the commissioners in each of the two hearings before them which were in respect of notices served by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to s. 28 of the Finance Act, 1960. The facts are largely common to the two cases because both the first taxpayer, Mr. William T. Hague, and the second taxpayer, his wife, were shareholders in Hague's Textiles, Ltd., which was not only a prosperous company but also one which received a large sum (about £113,000) in respect of the disposition of redundant cotton mills in 1959. The matter concerns the distribution of large sums by the company to the shareholders, and the questions to be decided arise out of notices served by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the purpose of "counteracting the tax advantages", as the phrase goes in the Act of 1960, obtained by the two shareholders by the manner of the distributions. Section 28 is a very remarkable piece of legislation and far from easy to construe.

[HIS LORDSHIP then referred to s. 28 and s. 43 of the Finance Act, 1960, relevant provisions of which are set out at footnote *, pp. 1253, 1254, ante, intimating that s. 28 (3) had particular importance in the appeal of the second taxpayer (Mrs. Hague) and, turning to the Case Stated in the appeal of the first taxpayer (Mr. W. T. Hague), read the paragraphs therefrom which are set out at p. 1255, letter A, to p. 1258, letter F, ante. HIS LORDSHIP stated that the findings of the commissioners (set out at p. 1258, letters B to G, ante) were of great importance, and continued:] The conclusions of the Special Commissioners include findings of fact, which have to be accepted for the purpose of the appeal, unless the finding is one which no reasonable tribunal could reach. The findings of the commissioners therefore, form an awkward obstacle to be overcome by the taxpayers. Reliance, however, was strongly placed on the observations of the House of Lords in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Brebner (2). In that case the commissioners held that the notice should be discharged because the transactions were entered into for bona fide commercial reasons and that the freedom from tax obtained was not one of their main objects. LORD PEARCE said (3):

"Admittedly, an object of the carrying out of the broad scheme by way of the resolutions was a tax advantage; but that which had to be ascertained was the object (not the effect) of each inter-related transaction in its actual context, and not the isolated object of each part regardless of the others. The subsection would be robbed of all practical meaning if one had to isolate one part of the carrying out of the arrangement, namely, the actual resolutions which resulted in the tax advantage, and divorce it from the object of the whole arrangement. The method of carrying it out was intended as one part of a whole which was dominated by other considerations.

"As the Lord President (LORD CLYDE) said (4) 'The material question is not what was the effect of each or all of the inter-related transactions, the question is what was the main object or objects for which any of them was adopted. Section 28 (1) of the Finance Act, 1960 draws a clear distinction between effect and object. It was to this latter question that the Special Commissioners rightly directed their attention. To do so they had to consider each particular transaction in the series in its proper setting'. For those reasons, I am of opinion that the Special Commissioners came to a reasonable conclusion on the evidence before them. They could have reached a contrary conclusion, which would have been equally unassailable, had they taken a different view of the evidence; but it was they who heard the witnesses, and I see no reason to suppose that their decision was not just and sensible. I entirely agree with the judgment of the Lord President."

Accordingly, LORD PEARCE said that he would dismiss the appeal. LORD UTHORP said (5):

"My lords, in the First Division the Lord President, delivering the first judgment, with which the other Lords of Session agreed, put it in a nutshell when he said: 'The issue raised in the case is a pure question of fact and from the facts found proved by the Special Commissioners there was ample evidence on which they could find as they did. The question which the Special Commissioners had to determine was what was the object in the mind of the respondent in entering into the transactions in question, and this is essentially a matter of fact and of inference for the commissioners.' With this I wholly agree. My lords, I would only conclude my speech by saying only that, when the question of carrying out a genuine commercial transaction, as this was, is considered, the fact that there are two ways of carrying it out—one by paying the maximum amount of tax, the other by paying no, or much less, tax—it would be quite wrong, as a necessary consequence, to draw the inference that, in adopting the latter course, one of the main objects is, for the purposes of the section, avoidance of tax. No commercial man in his senses is going to carry out commercial transactions except on the footing of paying the smallest amount of tax involved. The question whether in fact one of the main objects was to avoid tax is one for the Special Commissioners to decide on a consideration of all the relevant evidence before them and the proper inferences to be drawn from that evidence."

Counsel for the taxpayers, in seeking to apply those observations, argued that in the present case the commissioners really misdirected themselves in drawing an inference that one of the main objects of the company's operations was to avoid taxation, and he pointed to the inconsistency between their final findings in para. 9 of the Case and their statement in para. 4 (7):

"At the time when this was arranged, there was no question of the company either requiring further capital, or being over-capitalised. The sole purpose of capitalisation and issue of bonus shares was to put the company into a position to pay out £284,235 by means of a reduction of capital, and the sole purpose of reducing the capital was to pay over to stockholders money which was considered surplus to the company's requirements."

The concluding words of the same paragraph, however, contain an observation that tax considerations were borne in mind (see p. 1256, letter C, ante). It is, in my view, impossible to say that the commissioners could not reasonably have reached the conclusions which they expressed para. 9 of the Case; and it must be borne in mind that the terms of s. 28 (1) plainly place on the taxpayer the onus of showing that his case falls within the conditions requisite for escape from the section. I think that (Cross, J., (6) reached the correct result on this first point.

On the second point the question is one of quantification. The judge correctly stated (7) that the problem appears to be to discover how much of the sum received by the first taxpayer, which was obviously "the consideration" referred

A to in the section, was attributable to the £129,490 which prior to the capitalisation was available for distribution by way of dividend. The judge rejected the submission on behalf of the taxpayer that none of it was so attributable, but he also rejected the contention on behalf of the Crown that the proportion of the sum received by the first taxpayer which was to be attributable to the £129,490 was the fraction 129,490 over 284,235, and adopted as the denominator for the fraction the figure of 473,725, which was the figure (in pounds) of the company's increased capital. The problem is not a simple one, but I have come to the conclusion that the fraction stated by Cross, J., (8) is not the correct one and the denominator of 284,235 is the correct figure, being the amount (in pounds) that was distributed to the shareholders. Accordingly, I would allow the appeal on this point in favour of the Inland Revenue Commissioners.

C The remaining point relates to the second taxpayer, Mrs. Hague, whom, by the other notice under s. 28, it is sought to assess on the amount paid in respect of the shares which she held in the company. This question is far from simple. Cross, J., decided (8) the question against the taxpayer, really applying the decision of UNGOED-THOMAS, J., in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Brook (9). It is evident that Cross, J., (8) felt considerable doubt about the correctness of that decision.

D Now under the scheme of the Income Tax Acts dating back, I think, to the Income Tax Act, 1842, before the development of the married woman's separate property and its recognition in the Married Women's Property Acts, the income of a married woman, living with her husband, was treated as part of the income of the husband, and not as her income, and the tax on it was assessed on the husband. The income was "deemed to be the income of the woman's husband". That is a quotation from the section. Nowadays, either husband or wife by an appropriate notice can secure separate assessments but secure no advantage as regards the total amount of taxation. The husband, otherwise, is the person liable to pay, though there is a secondary provision enabling the tax to be collected from the wife, if the husband fails to pay it: see s. 354, s. 355, s. 356 and s. 359 of the Income Tax Act, 1952. So the wife is not assessed to tax if she is living with her husband and no notice requiring separate assessment has been served, and no notice requiring separate assessment has been served in the present case. The second taxpayer, Mrs. Hague, is in this position for the purposes of this appeal. She obtains no tax advantage in respect of tax on her income because she is not assessed to any tax. Her husband may obtain an advantage no doubt in respect of the tax which he might have to pay on her income.

G Now, it is necessary to examine the provisions of s. 43 (4), para. (g), and s. 28 (3) of the Finance Act, 1960, which I will read again. I will read s. 43 first. The material part is, of course, para. (g), as I have said.

H " 'Tax advantage' means a relief or increased relief from, or repayment or increased repayment of, income tax, or the avoidance or reduction of an assessment to income tax or the avoidance of a possible assessment thereto, whether the avoidance or reduction is effected by receipts accruing in such a way that the recipient does not pay or bear tax on them, or by a deduction in computing profits or gains."

I I should say here that a strenuous argument was put forward on behalf of the Crown in regard to the words "possible assessment". It was suggested that, as the second taxpayer or her husband might at any time give a notice requiring separate assessments, it was possible, therefore, that the assessment might arise and that the second taxpayer might thereby become taxable and might therefore possibly become assessable for the purpose of this paragraph. I do not accept that argument. It seems to me that "possible assessment" was not directed to future and what might be improbable events, certainly future events which may or may not happen. That is not, I think, the context in which the paragraph has been expressed.

Now I turn to s. 28 (3). I will read it again:

"Where this section applies to a person in respect of any transaction or transactions, the tax advantage obtained or obtainable by him in consequence thereof shall be counteracted by such of the following adjustments, that is to say an assessment or additional assessment, the nullifying of a right to repayment or the requiring of the return of a repayment already made (the amount to be returned being chargeable under Case VI . . .", and so on. I need not read, I think, the rest of the subsection. The words seem to me to be directed to a person who is assessable to tax and have no relevance to a person who is not assessable to tax.

In my view, the second taxpayer has not obtained any tax advantage, in the situation that I have stated, within the definition of "tax advantage" contained in s. 43 (4), para. (g), of the Act of 1960. This is clinched by the provisions of s. 28 (3), which I have just read, which refers, as I have said, to "assessment, additional assessment, right to repayment", and so on, which might be appropriate to the husband but are quite inappropriate to a married woman who is not assessable to the tax. As regards the husband, the provisions of sub-s. (2) refer to a person who receives something, and the husband has not received the money, because it has been paid to his wife.

Accordingly, in my opinion the second taxpayer's appeal succeeds and the notice served on her should be discharged.

SALMON, L.J.: I agree, and add a word only because we are differing from the judge (10) on two points. As far as the first point is concerned, the onus is on the first taxpayer to prove that the transactions to which DANCKWERTS, L.J., has referred had not, as one of their main objects, the avoidance of tax. This issue is really entirely an issue of fact. The commissioners found against the first taxpayer on this point, and I am not at all surprised. The judge (11) felt that he was bound by the commissioners' finding, and indeed expressed the view that on the facts in the case it is difficult to see how they could have properly come to any other finding on this point. I entirely agree with the judge.

The second point is very much more difficult. It concerns what is the appropriate fraction, for the purpose of assessing tax, to be applied to the dividends paid. Leaving out the hundreds and merely referring to the nearest thousand, is it 129,000 as an numerator over 284,000 as a denominator, as the Crown contends, or 129,000 over 473,000 as the taxpayer now contends and as the judge decided (12)? I, like DANCKWERTS, L.J., differ from the judge. I think that the correct fraction is 129,000 over 284,000.

Counsel for the taxpayers said that as the original scheme was to return £284,000 odd which was then the capital of the company we ought to reach a different conclusion. He said that in effect the whole scheme was to reduce capital. That was the sole purpose of the scheme. Since, however, the company could not very well be left without any capital, the capital was first of all increased by capitalising £129,000 of the undistributed profits and £60,000 that was available in respect of the redemption preference shares, so that the capital came to £473,000, and it was then reduced—the whole scheme was to reduce capital—by £284,000.

I cannot accept that contention. I can see the force of it if it were possible in the light of the facts found, to look on the prime purpose of the transaction as being reduction of capital; but nothing seems to me to be further from reality. This company had very nearly £600,000 of undistributed profits. I quote two short passages from the Case which seem to me to reveal that the sole purpose of the transaction was to get surplus cash into the hands of the shareholders. "The company thus had money surplus to its requirements" (see para. 4, (5) p. 1255, letter I, ante). "It was decided that £284,235 should be paid out to stockholders, such money being surplus to the company's requirements" (see para. 4 (6),

(12) [1967] 3 All E.R. at p. 1104, letter B.

- A p. 1255, letter I, ante). Pausing, there they hit on £284,000 which happened to be the capital of the company at that time) for the obvious reason, I think, that they reasonably considered that the best way of achieving their object was by a reduction of capital, and the only capital at that stage was £284,000. So that was a sum of money that they decided should be returned to the stockholders. If they had paid out surplus cash as a dividend from undistributed profits, it
- B would have been assessable for surtax in the hands of the stockholders.

Then in para. 4 (7) of the Case Stated (see p. 1256, letter B, ante) it is said: "At the time when this was arranged, there was no question of the company either requiring further capital, or being over-capitalised." If the real object of the exercise was to reduce capital, it seems very odd that the company was not over-capitalised, because it is only when a company is over capitalised that

- C commercially you reduce the capital. The Case goes on:

"The sole purpose of capitalisation and issue of bonus shares was to put the company into a position to pay out £284,235 by means of a reduction of capital, and the sole purpose of reducing the capital was to pay over to stockholders money which was considered surplus to the company's requirements."

- D I think that perhaps this question can be tested in this way: supposing that, instead of hitting on the magic figure of £284,000 to pay out to the shareholders, the company, for exactly the same reasons as those expressed in the Case, had decided to pay out £129,000 to the stockholders: £129,000 is taken from the undistributed profits and capitalised, together with the £60,000 to which I have
- E already referred; then those capitalised profits and that capitalised £60,000 is issued in the form of bonus shares to stockholders, so that the total issued paid-up capital is £473,000, and then the capital is reduced by £129,000; that is very satisfactory from the point of view of the stockholders. Instead of £129,000 being distributed, as it could have been, as a dividend out of the accumulated profits, which would have had the uncomfortable result of making them liable
- F to surtax, it comes to them as a reduction in capital. Now, could they say: "Oh, well, really you must look on this transaction as nothing more than an ordinary reduction in capital, and although I happen to have received the £129,000 which came into the capital from the undistributed profits, you can tax me only on £129,000  $\times$  129 over 473"?

- G I think that this would be ridiculous, because it is quite obvious that the £129,000 of undistributed profits was put into the pockets of the stockholders. I do not think it makes the slightest difference that £284,000 was paid out instead of £129,000; instead of the fraction being 129 over 129 (viz., the whole) as it would have been if £129,000, had been paid out, the right fraction is 129,000 over 284,000, since only £129,000 came out of undistributed profits.

- H The third point affects the second taxpayer. No application had been made by her or her husband to be assessed separately, and accordingly her income under the sections to which my lord has referred is deemed to be her husband's income, and he is assessed to tax not only in respect of his own personal income but also in respect of what, but for the Finance Act, 1960, would have been his wife's income. The second taxpayer is not liable to be assessed for tax. She has no personal tax liability, although provisions are made under s. 359 of the Income
- I Tax Act, 1952, that in the event of her husband not paying in respect of that part of his assessable income which derives from her it can be collected from her. However, she is not assessable and is not liable for tax; and the simple point, which I am bound to say appeals to my simple mind, made on her behalf is: "as I never was liable to tax, this transaction cannot have conferred any tax advantage on me".

Counsel for the Crown says that this is a most anomalous and indeed absurd state of affairs; and so it is. I think it has arisen because s. 28 was quite obviously designed primarily to strike at what are called dividend-stripping operations and the like, and para. (d) of sub-s. (2) was grafted on to deal with transactions such as those with which we are concerned; and it seems to me that it was grafted on to the section without sufficient thought being given to the consequences. I believe that the position that would arise in respect of a wife's income deemed to be the husband's income and on which she could not be separately assessed was entirely overlooked. No provision was made to deal with it. If there is no such provision in the Act we certainly have no power to call it into existence by assuming it, as indeed it seems to me we have been invited to do.

The argument on behalf of the Crown (and I hope that I am not doing it an injustice) is that the second taxpayer, in effect obtained a tax advantage for her husband. She avoided an assessment being made on him. To my mind this argument is wholly untenable, because s. 28 and s. 43 (4) (g) do not, in my view, contemplate anything being done by the taxpayer. The taxpayer obtains the advantage. The assessment is avoided not because of any action of the taxpayer's but because of the transaction of which he receives the fruits. Looked at in that way, it seems to me quite impossible to support the contention of the Crown.

A most ingenious argument was addressed to us which was founded on the use of the word "possible" assessment in the definition of "tax advantage"; but it puts an unbearable strain on the ordinary construction of the words of the Act of 1960. I entirely agree with DANCKWERTS, L.J., that it is an impossible construction.

It is fairly plain, I think, from the judge's judgment that, if the matter had been res integra, he would probably have decided the case the other way. The point, however, had been specifically covered in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Brook (13), and the judge felt that, although he had grave doubts about the correctness of that decision, on the whole he ought to follow it. We, fortunately, are not so inhibited in this court. One of the things that struck the judge (14), and strikes me, as very odd about the Crown's case was the results that would follow from s. 28 (3), if the Crown's case were right. The second taxpayer would then be assessed to tax on something which according to the legislature was not her income at all. It really comes to this: the Crown is saying that s. 28 (3) in cases such as the present (which perhaps one can be certain it never contemplated for a moment) was intending to impose a money penalty on the wife equal to the tax for which she would have been liable had the income not been deemed to have been her husband's. This contention does not commend itself to me. It is quite plain, in my view, that s. 28 (3) applies to people in the position of the first taxpayer in respect of that part of his income which is his own personal income. Because of a lacuna in the Act of 1960, he escapes here in respect of that part of his income which was his wife's personal income and is deemed to be his. There is this lacuna in the Act of 1960 and we cannot intervene to fill the gap. Parliament has certainly attempted to do so (maybe successfully) by s. 25 of the Finance Act, 1962; but that has no reference to the facts of this case. I would accordingly allow the appeal in relation to what I call the second and third points.

FENTON ATKINSON, L.J.: I agree with both judgments, and I do not think that there is anything which I can usefully add.
